LONDON READER

of Literature, Science, Art, and General Anformation.

TALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

No. 1619.-VOL LXIII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 12, 1894.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.

UGHTEED STOOPED AND KISSED HILDEGARDE'S HAIR, AND DREW HER HAND WITHIN HIS ARM PROTECTINGLY.

HIS TRUE WORTH.

-:0:--

CHAPTER I.

It was a valley, rich in green pasturelands, with the sheltering hills sloping upward on every side, and a shallow stream flowing through the heart of it.

The village of Drummerfield lay in this valley there were some, indeed, who called it a "town;" a village boasting a neat level High Street, and a water-cart in the dog-days. At one end of the little town stood the ivy-clad church; with three cracked bells in its square Norman tower, and a glinting weather-vane on the top of it.

det

One

the top of it. Some seven miles or so from Drummerfield was the real county town of Prince's Wroughton. On the green hillside, overlooking the tranquil valley, stood, in the midst of its neglected parkland, a large mansion, lonely and desolate looking, and surrounded by a weedy most that was

The roof was heavily gabled; the tall chimney stacks were gaunt and crocked; the diamondpaned windows, with their clumsy time-worn sort of way, amongst the weeds and brambles and fastenings, which rattled so noisily whenever the the dead leaves of a bygone year. wind swept up from the valley, were set deeply into walls all stained with the grim weather marks of centuries.

For the Moat House, as the place was called, was very old, and very memorable too. Brave Queen Bess and her dames of high degree were said to have passed a right there on their way to the revels at historic Keniiworth.

It was a gloomy old house, silent and full of nysterious shadow, dark with carved oak panelling, and with creaking oaken floors. An old house with many parlours, opening mostly one into the other; the ceilings of them beamed and low, and the windows of them deeply seated and cushioned, and flanked with huge cumbersome

In the rear of the house there was a hilly wilderness of a garden; a few flowers growing and flourishing there in the summer-time—but they were of the hardy, old-world kind and needed no tending to speak of.

the dead leaves of a bygone year.
At a remote corner of the garden, and just asparated from it by the dreary mont—that damp abode of croaking frogs, and loathsome reptiles that haunted the rotten, crumbling brickwork there was a small paddock, barren and deserted enough, with two or three dilapidated, half-recties sheds, which for years had been the sport of the wind and the rain, and occasionally the refuge of the nightjars and the owls that acreeched over the neglected garden. And at the back of these broken sheds a group of shivering poplars reared themselves skyward, seeming to touch the sad heavens in the twilight. One of these tall trees, at some forgotten time in the past, had been blasted downward by a lightning stroke; yet, withered and gray and bare as it was, it still stood there, whispering and shivering with its companions, waiting perchance until another stroke should stretch it low in the grass.

And that, alas! was all the land appertaining
A bent and aged gardener, however, was sometimes to be seen in the shrubberies, raking and sweeping here and there in a preoccupied, aimless

Grass.

And that, alas! was all the land appertaining now to the Moat House—some fifty acres or so of barren parkland, the empty paddock and the garden! There had been a time when things were differens—sy, different indeed—a time when almost the whole of Drummerfield village, and the fertile lands surrounding it, had belonged in natural birthright to the owners of theold mansion, and when a St. Austell had been called bord of the manor. But that, now, was a hundred years ago or more; and, whatever the St. Austella of Drummerfield might have been in those times, is was generally well known round about them, indeed an open secret, that they were poor enough in all conscience at the present day—as poor as rooks, or church mice, their neighbours all said, by whom nevertheless they were regarded with respect. They might be an unlucky family; all the same, they were a noble one, and their blood was of the blusst.

Nobody could tell exactly how or when their broad acres had gradually slipped from them, except that mortgage and high play had had a good deal to do with it—the reckless wild living, in brief, of the lords who were dead and gope.

And two only now remained of the fine old stock, one of whom lived her forlorn existence all the long year round without change at the Moat House. This was Lady St. Austell, the present Lord St. Austell's widowed mother, who had never since her marriage been a healthy and vigorous woman.

She was in these days a confirmed invalid, stricken down with an incurable apinal malady, having lain, almost entirely helpless, in an upper chamber of the great old house for the past four years or more, watched over and waited upon years or more, watchest over and wanted upon untiringly throughout that time by her adopted daughter, Georgie Walmer, who, at the death of her parents, had been sent over from India to Lady St. Austell as a sacred charge from a long-lost friend

Lady St. Austell, in her youth, had loved well the mother of Georgie Walmer; and it was for that mother's sake that she had welcomed so giadly the young girl herself, soon growing to think of the orphan as a real daughter of her OWO.

Georgie was scarcely five years old when she had landed in England; and now she was nearly twenty-one. Her affection for her friend and guardian was as boundless as her gratitude. Lady St. Austell, indeed, was the girl's closest friend and mather in one. And Georgie now, was only too thankful to be of service in the sick-She could do something at last, she thought, towards repaying this se cond mother for all her goodness and unstinted affection.

Thus, in the sick-room, where Georgie was ever to be found at her post, her patience never failed, her gentiences and devotion were unvarying, her sympathy was ever ready in fullest measure, Her grateful, clinging nature was such that in this well-doing it could know no wearings, and her labour was a labour of infinite love and

It was a calm, sultry evening in June, and the hour was that of susset. The windows of Lady St. Austell's chamber were open to the warm west breeze that came stealing up from the valley, and floated in, scented with the perfume of the distant hayfields.

The great room, furnished partly like a sitting-room, was panelled from floor to calling, and the heavy furniture it contained was both old and

But the duli room was brightened everywhere with bowls and nosegays of sweet old-fa-hioned flowers that Georgie Walmer herself had culled from the wild and weedy garden in the rear of Lady St. Austell was raised upon the pillows, her worn, yet once beautiful face as weary-looking was wont to be.

Her hair, promaturely gray, was crowned gracefully with a lace cap, with broad lappets. In age was scarcely fifty, but she looked quite ten years older.

By the open window sat Georgie, with a book in her knee-a slender, white-robed flaure, with a knot of lilies at her bosom. One rarely called her lovely; but her features, in a general way, attracted the attention of all by reason of their sweetness in expression; her eyes were soft and trustful, and gentle as the eyes of a dove. In her clear, low voice she was reading one of Longfellow's saddest poems. Lady St. Austell delighted in poetry—as a rule she cared little for prose—for good poetry, if well read, would some-times soothe her into slumber; and sleep to the sufferer, at any time, meant case and freedom

"Darling, I'm tired of it!" came the rather evish interruption. "Somehow it makes me posvish interruption. "Somehow it makes me feel wretched this evening—Evangeline is too sad. Let us have something else, Georgia."

The young girl looked up with her patient, sweet smile.

"Of course, if you wish it," she answered, ightly. "And what shall it be, dear mother?" brightly. "And what shall it be, over mostell by
It was her custom to call Lady St. Austell by that cherished and sacred name, had done so even when a little child.

"You must decide for me, darling," the invalid murmured, still in the rather previals intonation that Georgie knew so well, and was so patient with, too, withal. "Do you remember what it was that you were reading last night? I liked it

"Ah, jos!" Georgie said. "It was the 'Courship of Miles Standial. She turned the leaves of her volume, with a quick soft hand. "Shell we go on with it now, dear mother?" she Please, Georgie."

"And are you quite easy, quite comfortable ?"
"As usual, Georgic. How can I expect to be anything else. I am listening."

The young girl elsered her voice again; whilst the scent of the distant haybooks was waited in, commingled with the breath of the flowery valley hedge-rows

This kind of life would have been insufferably rksome to a nature less unworldly than that of Georgie Walmer; and any other than she might have been emphatically miserable at the lovely and impoverlehed Moat House.

But Georgie, in her own way, contrived to be tolerably happy. Not even within herself did alse ever rebel against the uneventful, joyless existence that she passed with Lady St. Austell. "It was here that we left off yesterday," Georgie said, " was it not !-

Over him rushed, like a whul that is keen and cold and relentless, Thoughts of what might have been, and the weight and wes of his errand; All the dreams that had faded, and all the hopes that had vanished, All him life hunceforth a dreamy and tenantiess mansion, Haunted by vain regrets, and pallid, surrowful faces. Still he said to himself, and almost fiercely he said it.

Let not him that putteth his hand to the plough look

Let not him that putteth his hand to the plough look backwards; Though the ploughabare out through the flowers of life to the fountains, Though it pass o'er the graves of the dead and the hearts of the string, It is the will or—

When the room door opened abruptly, and a man came in, as if to illustrate, as it were, to a certain extent in the fiesh, the words which had so lately fallen from the lips of Georgie Walmer.

He was a stalwart, well-made man of perhaps some thirty years, the striking beauty of the dark face marred by the discontented, restless expression which of late had become habitual to it. His mouth, which in truth was somewhat stern and cruel looking, was hidden by a crisp short beard; though his eyes occasionally could be kindly and pleasant enough when that cloud of discontent was banished transiently from his

This was Ughtred, Lord St. Austell, twelfth Baron of his line; Lady St. Austell's only son. The Moat House was his own, and his home too; but, for all that, he hated it thoroughly, fiercely—hated it for its poverty, and for its dreary ugliness and barrenness which, as yet, he was owerless to render otherwise. Until recently Drummerfield had seen very little of him; for during the past five or six years he had chosen to lead the life of a wanderer, getting rid, after his own fashion, of a great deal more money than he could afford to spend, and roundly cursing his ill-luck, as he was pleased to term it, at the same time.

There was but one path open to him-one chance, one worldly move on the chessboard of of his house; and that one step was a wealthy marriage.

Lord St. Anstell himself knew perfectly well that this last expedient was his only means of salvation. And he was on the very brink of the plungs, as it were, already; that is to eay, he had accepted, had acquiesced in, the worldly alterna-

He had just now come up from his solitary wine-drinking in the old oak dining-room below. Lady St. Austell herself dined in the middle of the day; and Georgie Walmer, as a rule, shared the meal with her adopted mother. At the entrance of her son Lady St. Austell had looked up eagerly; but the eyes of Georgie were dropped on the page of Miles Standish. "Ughtred, is that you ?"

"Yes, mother. I'm off to Courtgardens, of course, and just stepped up to see you for a moment before I start. Georgie," turning to her —"you shouldn't read in the twilight; you'll ruin your eyes.'

She only smiled; but the hot colour had risen to either cheek, and her heart was thumping tumultuously.
Poor little faithful Georgie!

You walk there, I suppose, Ughtred ?" his mother inquired. he replied idly, " the stroll over, you how, in pleasant of an evening."

"You always start so late, to my thinking, Ughtred," Lady St. Austell remarked, querulously; "and in many ways, I think; you are hardly fair to Hildegarde Ray."

"Am I not? Well, goodnight," he said aboutly families and abruptly, turning away.

"Be sure you give my love to Hildegarde," Lady St. Austell called after him—and Ughtred halted for a moment—"and remind her that she has not been to see me lately. Ask her to come and see me soon

"All right-I'll tell her," was the careless reply; then he added with more gentleness and courtesy-" By the way, mother mine, I should have inquired how you are this evening. Essier, I hope

Lady St. Auntell sighed

"There is no difference—at least, I feel none," e murmured sadly. "Please do not forget to she murmured sadly. "Please do not for give my love to Hildegarde. Do you Ughtred?" Of course," impatiently. "Goodnight little Goodnight Ughtred."

And then he was gone; and the summer twi-light, to Georgie Walmer seemed all of a sudden to have grown closer and darker. She knew that she could no longer see to read Miles Standish;

but something more than the gloaming was dimming and obscuring her vision now. "It is dark," she said, almost tremulously.

qu

ado Ba

roo

and her

Ara

ligh

gard

to h

Moa T

wher

Drur

Hilde

Arab

at th

rende somel

"Shall we have the lamps, dear mother?"
"Yes, if you like. Oh, Georgie!" with audden pessionate feeling—" what a merciful thing it is for us that he has learned to love Hildegards. I have so hoped and prayed that he might win her—she is so rich; rich and beautiful to-gether, exactly what Ughtred should have in a wife. He could not have made a wiser choice; and then, when he is married to her, he will never want to roam the world again. And think -only think what her money will be able to do for the Moat House ! How thankful we should be, Georgie, you and I, darling, to know that there is a certainty of his settling down quietly at last!"

Georgie could tell by her intonation that Lady St. Austell was expecting some sort of comment or reply; and so, as the young girl was occupied at a distant table, lighting a large shaded lamp there, with her face turned from the bed, she was brave enough to essay one; and her voice faltered not at all.

"Indeed, I am very thankful," said Georgie gently. "Yes," exclaimed Lady St. Austell fervently, clasping her thin jewelled hands upon the coverlet, "I thank Heaven, with heart and soul, that he is going to marry dildegarde Ray!"

CHAPTER IL

SITUATED about three quarters of a mile or so from the village of Drommerfield, and lying well back from the high road which led to Prince's Wroughton, there was a large country house called Courtgardens.

It was of comparatively modern architecture, and built of dull red brick—square and most substantial of aspect.

Au avenue of chestnuts led up from the principal lodge to the front entrance of Courtgardens—the home of the great heiress, Hildegarde Ray, the promised bride of Ughtred Lord St. Austell.

was a perfectly well-known fact in the county that the late owner and master of Courtgardens had amassed in trade the large fortune which he had bequeathed to his only child; and consequently there had been no slight amount of un-pleasantness in the exclusive neighbourhood of Drummerfield at the time that Courtgardens was purchased and refurnished on a grand and munificent scale throughout, and Reuben Ray first came to settle there as a landed proprietor and a country gentleman of leisure.

For a long time the neighbourhood held out steadily against having anything whatever to do with the Manchester man of commerce, his gentle, delicate wife, who looked every inch a lady, and the one little daughter with the German name, whom they had brought from the north with

Indeed Mrs. Ray herself was of German extraction, a native of Erfurt, and hence her daughter's name.

But soon the rumour spread that the new comers were fabulously rich, of princely wealth in fact, and the natural result followed are long as it invariably does in social instances of the kind. In due course "those Raya" were looked upon as actual county folk and follow Christians, and their objectionable mushroom origin and presumption in cettling at Courtgardens were affected to be forgotten.

When Miss Ray was in her eighteenth year, her father was killed through a fall in the hunting-field, and the shock of his tragic end was the death-kneil of his loving and delicate wife. She followed Reuben Ray before the year was out, And then it was that their beautiful daughter Hildegarde found herself left alone in the v sole mistress of splendid Courtgardens and fifty thousand a-year

At Hildegarde's request, her earnest invitation, a homely, matter-of-fact, though withal lovable old relative on her father's side came to live with her and chaperon her after the death of her parents—a maiden cousin, she was in reality, some three or four times removed, by name Miss arabella Trott. This little old lady still lived with Hildegarde at Courtgardens, and was much beloved by the poorer and needler inhabitants of Drummerfield by reason of her charitable qualities and honely, Samaritan-like wayspropensities, indeed, which had always been accouraged by generous Hildegarde Ray herself.

In her exalted position as a great heiress, Miss Ray was naturally besieged by a whole army of adorers and would-be suitors for her favour. But Hildegarde's horror was intense and deeprooted, lest she might be sought out and wooed, and perchance unwittingly won, for the sake of her great fortune alone—the fortune which Miss Arabella Trott often declared that her young friend and kinswoman estimated by far too

So at eight-and twenty the mistress of Court-gardens was still Hildegarde Ray, though engaged to be married, at last, to Lord St. Austell of the Most House.

The engagement at the present time was only of a few months' standing. Nearly a year before, when Ughtred Lord St. Austell had returned to Drummerfield from one of his erratic sojournings abroad, he had no more intention of wooing Hildegarde Ray than be had of marrying Miss Arabelia Trott herself. He had certainly arrived at the conclusion that he must marry somebody —and marry wisely also; that, indeed, was rendered imperative by circumstances; but somehow he had never dreamed of the heiress of Courtgardens as the woman he might win perhaps for the trying.

His thoughts on the subject of a rich wife being vague and shadowy in the extreme, they had gone wandering farther sfield. He did not exactly want to marry a woman he could not love; but he needed money, and money he must have; and the one thing, it seemed, was not to be obtained without doing the other, unfortunately.

Nor was it that Ughtred St. Austell was in the least degree calculating and dishonourable by nature; only bitter with himself, as it were, and the world he lived in. His faith was strong in the good things of this life; he scorned the bare notion of happiness without them.

It was Lady St. Austell, his mother, who had in the first instance suggested that he should marry Hildegarde Ray; and then he marvelled at his own stupidity in that he had not thought of Hildegarde before !

Having of late years been so seldom at the Moat House, the old home he bated for its gloom and its poverty, Lord St. Austell had always seemed to Hildegarde little better than the most ordinary stranger. But this latest stay of his in Drummerfield had proved to be an unusually lengthy one, and thus it came to pase that he and Hildegarde met more frequently than they had ever done before at the social entertainments of mutual friends and neighbours.

Lord St. Austell was very much in cornest—he had made up his mind to win Hildegarde Ray. He was clever, clear-sighted, and his will was strong, and so he won her in the end; not however by flattery, gifte, and shallow, extravagant love-making, but by constant and very ordinary kindnesses, by patient solicitude and quiet, man-like courtesy.

The proud, sensitive, sceptical Hildegarde, who heretefore had sent so many autors hopelessly and unceremoniously from her presence, suspecting and mistrusting their integrity, now smiled favourably on Lord St. Austell.

With a woman's strange capriciousness she trusted and believed in him implicitly; for to her he did not seem in the least like other men. Somehow she could not accredit him with base and mercenary motives, as she had accreditedand perhaps unjustly so—those other woors before him. He was infinitely too proud and noble-hearted, she told herself tranquilly, to be capable either of meanness or ungodliness.

She was perfectly aware, like the rest of her neighbours, that Ughtred St. Austell was very poor; poor indeed for his position; and she louged to enrich him with the wealth she wanted not; she valued it now, indeed, only for his sake —to cast it all down at his feet for acceptance, as a simple proof of her trust and her

He had succeeded, absolutely, in touching her heart, and she would never doubt him for the Women at eight and-twenty lightly love; more especially if, like Hildegarde, they have never loved before,

On this warm, still, hay ocented June evening, when Lord St. Austell had told his mother that he was going to Courtgardens, Hildegarde was expecting him.

She was standing—her dress a rich white ailk, with yellow roses at her throat, and a diamond comb in her hair—amongst the brilliant flowerbeds on the wide soft sloping lawn in front of the drawing-room windows. She was gazing, with a tender smile upon her lips, in the direction of the chestnut avenue, up which he would come from the lodge-gates.

Hers was a queenly figure combined with an attractive face—a really beautiful face, serene, refined, and thoughtful; with large, steadfast, gray-black eyes—those eyes of Irish gray—and a smooth, wide white brow.

In graceful fashion—a fashion all her own, and peculiar to herself—she wore her soft and abundant raven hair woven and coiled around the diamond comb.

Her grand, Junoesque figure was perhaps just a trifle too fully developed; but then Hildegarde Ray could no longer be considered in the first blush of youth, with her nine-and-twentieth birthday drawing near.

The great centre window in the drawing-room op ned on the lawn; and by this window there eat a sprightly looking little old lady, with a bunch of short, tight, iron-gray curls flattened on either side of her face, and a smart cap surmounting sade or her race, and a same cap surmounting them. Her spectacles rested on her nose, and she was sewing busily.

This was Miss Arabella Trott, commonly called "Aunt Bella" by Hildegarde, for the sake of brevity and convenience.

clock somewhere in the house chiraed the half-hour after eight. Hildegards at the same

"He is late again," she said to herself. "I wish that he would came to me a little earlier and a little oftener—sometimes."

And a sigh escaped her involuntarily—a pen-sive look shadowed the glorious gray eyes.

"Hildegarde," called out Aunt Bolla, in her quick treble voice, "I have just finished this flannel wrapper for Mrs. Parker's baby, and I want the poor soul to have it this evening, as the small mite is ailing. I promised her she should. So, my dear, you won't mind my running down into the village with it, will you? I shall soon be back, and you can give Lord St. Austell his coffee without me, you know."

Hildegarde Ray strolled slowly up to the window, and the little old lady rose then from her seat and shook out the blue flamel wrapper, herring-boned and bound with white, which was destined for Mrs. Parker's sickly infant.

Cannot Mrs. Parker wait until to-morrow ? said Hildegarde, with her calm smile. " Is will be quite dusk before you reach home again, Aunt

Bella ; and besides-

"That won't matter a bit," put in Miss Bella, in her quick short way. "I never mind summer darkness. And I want particularly, also, to call in at Dr. Hodeon's and give Richard a serious talking to L. hall instead himset home if I talking to, I shall just eatch him at home if I go now. Do you know, Hildegarde, I don't believe he understands properly that rather complicated case of Nancy Brown's-his present treatment of her, I feel certain, has been alto-Brown's-his present gether wrong from the first. A pretty scandal, indeed, would there be for Drummerfield, if my own nephew, Richard Falkland, were to go and poison Nancy Brown through ignorance and inex perience.

"Richard is by far too clever and careful to commit any error of the kind," Hildegarde an-swered, gravely. "Nancy Brown is a very old she cannot in reason expect to get well WOMAN in a week.

Nevertheless," rejoined Aunt Bella, can be no harm in my telling Richard exactly what I think of the matter. And there's that disreputable Polly Hayes—I must be after her too. I never met her like, I declare! Really, Hildegarde, the gross ingratitude of the lower orders is in these days something appalling !"

Miss Arabella Trott hastened from the room, and Hildegarde turned her anxious gaze again towards the lodge and the chestnut avenue. Then she saw him coming and went to meet him.

You are a little later than usual, dear, are you not ?" she said gently, with just a suspicion, perhaps, of reproach in her voice, though there was no shadow of it discernible in those loving. gray, grave eyes of hers, as they came together under the fragrant chestnut boughs. "I have under the fragrant chestnut boughs. been watching for you, indeed, since eight o'clock. You promised me yesterday that you would be with me at eight, Ughtred."

He shrugged his shoulders, half unconsciously, but in true French style. Hildegards noticed the movement, and it pained her.

"Did I really ?" he returned carelessly. "Ah, yes, of course, I remember new! But you will forgive me, I know—I hadn't an idea how the time was silpping away. Let me make atone-ment, Hildegarde, I will come and dine with you to-morrow; may I ?"
"May you !" she echoed, with a lovely smile, fall of adoration and truet.

Then he stooped and kissed her hair, and drew her hand within his arm protectingly. She only smiled again—her own grave tender smile—and a happier light came into her eyes.

She did not doubt the truth of his word, she had never doubted his honour, only she yearned for a little more tenderness on his part some-times, and a little less of indifference.

He never had been an ardent, a demonstrative lover, she knew; it was not in his nature so to be, she thought; yet now that he had won her, and his wooing was crowned with success, she certainly caught herself fancying sometimes that his manner was colder and a shade more reserved than in those past other days before she had given him her promise and her surrender was complete.

"You are not angry with me, I trust?" he said, a trifle anxiously, bending downward his dark head again and just brushing once mere her hair with his beard.

"Oh, I never could be angry with you, Ughtred," she answered earnestly. "No—I was growing rather weary of waiting and watching for you, that was all. I had begun to fear that you were not coming. My Ughtred, I am content new." mow.

Yes-close to him, tail and dark and stalwart, with her hand resting against his side—she was happy now, as she told him. To him her forgiveness was ever ready; it was so easy to pardon anything, no matter what the iniquity, when he was with her.

The night was exceeding fair, so they did not go indoors, as Hiidegarde was fond of wandering about her own beautiful grounds when Ughtred came to Courtgardens of an evening, and of talk-ing with him the while of his invalid mother, whom she loved for her lover's sake.

On one sade of the house, where the lawn was mossy and undulating, there was a dense grove of larches, a favourite haunt of the nightingale that was already trilling its liquid song in the twilight. Up in the purple sky a silver star was twinkling wanly, whilst the moon in its neighbourhood was but young as yet, and scarcely more than a crescent.

The time passed swiftly—all too swiftly—at least for Hildegarde Ray.

Going in presently, Hildegarde and Lord St.
Austell discovered that Aunt Bells had returned from her excursion into the village. The long drawing-rooms were brilliantly lighted, and Miss Arabella Trott was perched behind her tea-table. Lord St. Austell shock hands with her languidly, and then dropped into the nearest chair. Privately he considered Aunt Bella commonplace and had form, but he was decently civil to her for Hildegarde's sake.

And privately Miss Trott thought Ughtred St.

Austell infinitely inferior to her dear Hildegarde in every way, and inwardly stigmatised him, too, as priggish, conceited, selfish, and overbearing, albeit he possessed a grand handle to his name, and could boast a pedigree that dated perhaps from the Conquest. In brief, secretly, there was no love lost between these two.

Even as he sipped his tea and chatted dutifully with Hildegarde, he was thinking more of her fortune than of Hildegarde herself—and perhaps Aunt Bella knew it. determine?

She must indeed be rich," ran insensibly the thoughts of Ughtred St. Austell as he stared unseeingly into the calm, beautiful face, with its gracious love-lit eyes.

"She lives here so quietly, so simply, with this old woman, she cannot spend a quarter of her fifty thousand a year." He remembered then, with a sudden pang of mixed pride and bitterness, his own empty coffers, his own utter unworthiness; and at the moment he almost hated Hildegarde Ray for the wealth she would bring to him on her weddingmorn.

The best looking and the largest house in the Drummerfield High Street was unquestionably the residence of Dr. Hobson.

There was a broad gateway on one side of it, and commodious stabling at the back.

The three rows of windows in the front were neat and shining and spotless always; for the doctor's spouse was an energetic housewife and an excellent manager in every way, dearly loving the smell of soap and water, and the homely sound of the scrubbing brush.

sound of the scrubbing-brush.

She had no children, thank goodness, to plague her mortal life out, as she often and loudly declared, and so—as is frequently the case with such women—the greater part of her time was devoted to harassing the maids and "looking after" the house, the spick and span condition of which had long since become proverbial amongst. which had long since become proverbial amongst the Drummerfield ladies of her acquaintance.

There was a side door to Dr. Hobson's commodious dwelling-house which opened direct into the surgery; and exactly opposite to this side entry stood a red and green lamp, bearing on each one of its four coloured sides the word "Dispeneary" in white letters-a thing of beauty and a joy for ever, this, to the village urchins when lighted after dark.

The large surgery-window-which was perhaps a triffe less spotless than its fellows-was darkened about half way up by a thick wire-blind, over which Richard Falkland was accustomed to nod cheerily to his friends in the street when mixing up his prescriptions at the dispensary counter.

Richard Falkland was the only son of his mother; and she, a widow, was the only surviv-ing sister of Miss Arabella Trott, the friend and chaperon of the rich Miss Ray.

Richard had come to Drummerfield during the past winter, fresh from some rather tough exami-nations at St. Thomas's, which he had passed with brilliant honours.

He came to Drummerfield for two reasons first, because Dr. Hobson had found himself in want of a clever young assistant to whom he might with safety intrust the lighter and less important work; and secondly, because his mother's sister, Aunt Bella, lived in the neighbourhood, and he thought that he should like to be near her.

In fact, it was Aunt Bella horself who, knowing that Richard was resting at home after his recent successful labours, and at the same time was looking for a start in his profession, had written and told him of Dr. Hobson's vacant berth, having previously spoken to the doctor himself concerning her nephew's undoubted merit and

Everyone in Drummerfield, by this time, had learned to like Richard Falkland; even the beautiful Hildegarde Ray was sincerely interested in Aunt Bella's nephew, cordially telling the little old lady to invite him to Courtgardens wheneoever she pleased.

And although Richard Falkland had dwelt but a few months in Drummerfield, already had he met his fate—a fate which to poor Dick seemed of the sternest and cruellest order; a fate which, as he told himself with all due humility, must remain inexorable to the end.

Yet, with a hopeless secret locked away in his breast, Richard contrived to be cheerful and sweet-tempered enough before the world; and not one of those who loved and respected him for his worth guessed how sore was the heart within him.

It was a hot and sunny morning at the beginning of July, and the water-cart had just gone rumbling down the High Street. The hands of the surgery clock pointed to half-past

Richard, at one end of the counter, with a gasjet flaring in his eyes, was sealing up and direct-ing bottles of physic; and the doctor himself, at the other end, his red face and bald head shining with perspiration, was pounding away with a small pestle and mortar.

Dr. Hobson, having finished his pounding, mopped his glistening forehead with a violet-sitk pocket handkerchief.

"There, that's done, thank goodness!" said he, with a sigh of relief. "See that the powders go round to the Vicarage before twelve o'clock, Falkland, or they will be sending up here for

"All right," answered Dick, with a cheery nod, as he lifted for an instant his bright brown eyes from the stick of sealing wax he was holding to

"Thank goodness!" ejaculated the doctor, for the second time, bustling about, the heat not-withstanding, and wiping his hands in the long moist towel which hung there upon its roller behind the surgery-door.

"By the way, there's Lady St. Austell's cooling-mixture," Richard said, remembering that Dr. Hobson would be passing the dilapidated crested gates of the Moat House—"won't you take it with you, air? The boy has his hands full this morning.

"Ah, yes, then, I may as well," agreed the doctor; and he took the bottle in its neat white sealed wrapper from Falkland's hand. "Lamust call and see her, too, on my way home; though 'tis little enough that I, or anyone else, can do for her now, poor soul," he added, shaking his

And then he went out into the hot morning sunshine, climbed into his gig, and drove briskly away on his rounds.

Richard Falkland, left alone, pulled down the window at the top, and began to whistle softly to himself. His hands were still busy, but his to himself. His hands were still busy, but his thoughts were yet busier.

"I wonder when they will ask me to Court-gardens again," he was musing. "It seems ages since I was there last; and yet in reality it is scarcely a fortnight ago! But she doenn't know, she never will in this world, how infinitely kinder and wiser it would have been if she had never received and had withheld. never recognised my existence, and had withheld her gracious amiles altogether. Good heavens, what a fool I have been-what a presumptuous, thoughtless, miserable fool! And yet—and yet I have not the moral strength to keep away when they bid me come! The temptation is too great -the prospect is too sweet-and I cannot resist have one consolation nevertheless-the secret of my folly is my own, thank Heaven !" Though his thoughts were troubled, he whistled on cheerily still; and though, too, his bright brown eyes were sad and shadowed just then, there was yet a smile, half humorous, half tender, about his sweet-tempered mouth. Suddenly he ceased in the middle of his tune, and listened intently.

and listened intentity.

Everything was very still out of doors. The hot silence was broken only by the buzzing of a blue-bottle behind the wire-blind, together with the subdued sound of the domestic scrubbingbrush working away incessantly in some upper room of the doctor's house.

But Dick's quick ears could hear something clse—the far-off roll of carriage-wheels coming rapidly towards the village along the dusty high-

With a nervous hand Richard Falkland put back into its place upon a shelf a purple jar, a few drachms of the contents of which he had lately required, and then he took up his station at the extreme end of the dispensary counter where he could see well out of the window, sidewise fashion, over the dingy wire blind.

The roll of the carriage-wheels drew nearer and nearer, and faster and faster beat the foolish heart of Richard Falkland—he knew the sound so well i Soon Miss Ray's carriage-she was not driving her spirited cream-coloured ponies to-day-came into view; her magnificent dark-green carriage and raven-black horses.

This warm summer morning it was wide open of course, and Hildegarde herself was lying back upon the cushions, alone, looking so sweet and calm, so wholly and superbly beautiful, that the hot blood rushed swiftly up into poor Richard's face and dyed it for the moment a living crimson.

He had no desire nor intention to be seen there himself, but Hildegarde Ray was too quick for him.

From beneath the deep lace of her sunshade she glanced at the surgery window; and catching sight of the young man's brown head above the op of the blind, just as he was in the very act, indeed, of drawing away from it, she bowed to him directly with her lovely smile, which poor Dick, in a blind spasmodic sort of fashion, some how contrived to acknowledge and return; and then, unutterably wretched and deathly pale, be eaned heavily for support against the framework of the window. All his colour was gone, and his usually bright eyes were dim.

"She is going to the Moat House," he muttered aloud—"she is going to the man she loves! Since I may love you and worship you only in secret—ob, Hildegarde, why did we ever meet! Hildegarde, Hildegarde, I love you, and I would die for you!" Poor Dick indeed!

(To be continued.)

LADY RAVENHILL'S SECRET.

-:0:-

CHAPTER X .- (continued.)

"I nore you are going to get rid of that black he said, after a second's hesitation. is not fit for any lady to drive-a hard-mouthed, vicious, dangerous animal."

"Yes, I remember you saying you wondered my husband allowed me to drive such a brute!"

said, with a peculiar smile.

"Yes, and I put my foot in it. I mean, I said the wrong thing, as I always do," he replied, in a lower voice. "As I—I understand that you are a widow, and I beg your pardon for my stupid blunder most sincerely."
"You did not think I looked like a widow, I suppose," she observed, with her eyes bent upon her work, but her heart beating so fast that it seemed almost to choke her.

"No, since you ask me; I did not then, and I do not now."

"Appearances are deceitful sometimes," she said, raising her eyes, and looking into his face with a strange expression of mingled resentment

Widow, indeed! What would he say if some wicked fairy were to whisper in his ear that the supposed widow was his own wife?

"And is it long since—since you have lost our husband?" he asked, with an air of well feigned sympathy. About three years !" she returned, her eyes again glued to her work.

What pretty little dainty hands she had, thought the young man beside her—so thin, and small, and taper !

But why were they shaking so strangely trembling so much that the needle seemed hardly under the command of those fairy subject. His suspicion was realised by a low voice suddenly saying,— "Lord Ravenhill, please never speak to me of my husband again! It is, as you can imagine, a very painful subject."

Perhaps the late Mr. Hill was really a sore His suspicion was realised by a low subject.

"Oh! of course, certainly," he stammered.
"In fact, I'm afraid, that for a stranger you will think I have been procumpanty free and easy.

think I have been uncommonly free and easy, and inquisitive and rude !" Free and easy, and inquisitive and rude!

How many more names are you going to call yourself?" she asked, with a smile.

"They seemed to be getting on very well," said Mary to herself, as she glanced stealthily at this most extraordinary pair.

And what a handsome couple they were! What marvellous self-command Nellie had brought

She was working away and laughing, and chatting, and smiling as if her neighbour was the most ordinary, everyday acquaintance.

Ab! Mary—you don't know as much as you think! Appearances are deceifful.

Scon a large flock of visitors were ushered in, and scattered about the apartments, drinking tea and eating cake, and retailing the local gossip to Captain, Mrs. and Miss Fortescue.

The couple at the other side of the table remained undisturbed, and continued their conversation with uninterrupted zest "So!" said a discontented dandy to himself, as he glanced irritably at the pair in question, then at his own reflection in the glass, then at them again. "So the pretty widow has come off her high horse at last, and is letting that dark fellow that owns the big steam-yacht make himself very agreeable to her!" He was talking very earnestly—very eagerly—about something or other, and she was listening quite complacently. Perhaps she would do the usual thing, and give him one of her awful snubs soon; and send him away like many others—a er, if not a wiser man i

He was an uncommonly good-looking man, too. May be that was the reason she was giving him

"There! He has got it at last!" he said to himself, with great glee, as he saw the yachting man push back his chair with a gesture of impa-tience, put down his tea-cup, and move over to where his friend, Captain Fortescue, was exercising all his attractions on two young ladies. What had Nellie said to drive him from her side. You shall hear.

After talking very pleasantly for some time, about ordinary every day topics, Lord Ravenhill had suddenly harked back again to the subject of the black cob.

"I beg you will get rid of him, Mrs. Hill; he is not safe, I assure you he is not! He might do for a Polo pony, but he is certainly not cut out for harness, oblige me." Send him up to Tattersall's, and "Oblige you? Why should I oblige you, Lord Ravenhill?" she asked, with a faint smile, and raised eyebrows.

"Well, oblige your friends, among whom I hope you will permit me to enrol myself?"

To that request there was no answer for some

"May I ? May I consider myself your friend ?" he urged.
"No!" she burst out suddenly. "No! I don't want your friendship." Her companion gazed at her for a moment in stupefied astonishment. This was plain English with a vengeance !

"All right, Mrs. Hill," he answered, at last, reddening even under his sunburnt skin. "I'm not a fellow to intrude myself where I am not wanted, nor to offer my friendship twice!"

So saying he got up and left her, as we have already seen.

Nellie glanced after him as he walked across the room, It was wisest—far wisest—to put a barrier between them at the very outset, she said to herself valiantly.

Friendship might lead to something else, to some ridiculous complications.

Best remain strangers.

She was a widow he had met accidentally at the seaside; and he was a friend of Teddy Fortescue's, and there the matter must end— would end—should end!

He was not a man to offer his friendship twice as he had said. But what possessed him to offer it at all ?

She stole a good look at him, as she stood talking to Mary Fortescue-a leisurely, critical

She could not help remarking that he was one of the handsomeet men she had ever seen—tail, slight, and well-bred looking, with a rather grave,

"My husband!" she said to herself, inaudi-bly of course, and the blood mounted to her temples as she uttered the three syllables. How odd it seemed !

At any rate, he was a man of whom she could justly be proud, and she there and then felt a secret, strange little thrill of satisfaction, as she took in every inch of his well-cut features, the slightly haughty carriage of his head, and his

"He is furious with me," she said to herself, "and it is just as well. I daresay if he had the most distant idea of who I was, he would be somewhat astounded; he would not think so much of me then—his toy, as I was to have

Nevertheless, when the little tea party broke p and Lord Ravenhill took his leave, she could not refrain from giving him her hand in answer to a very distant bow—and out of pure contrariness-a most charming, bewitching smile, the memory of which he carried away with him, and treasured most foolishly for three whole

CHAPTER XI.

"I WONDER at you, Nellie! I really am not easily astonished, but you astonished me this afternoon!" said her friend, coming into her room as she was dressing for dinner. "Such cool self-possession I never saw! How you could keep your countenance and chatter away in that charming, everyday manner to away in that charming, everyday manner to your own husband—speaking to him in that character for the first time—is quite beyond comprehension! Were you not nervous? Were you not nearly bursting out laughing, or

Were you not been your crying, or something?" said her friend, " was nervous enough," said her friend, and coil, and twisting her long hair into a neat coil, and inserting various heir pins with much judgment and deliberation; "and I was nearly hysterical too, when he asked me point blank if I was a widow? It seemed such an outrageous question—coming—coming from my husband him-

"You appeared to be getting on ewimmingly at first!" said Mary, scating herself beside the dressing-table, and staring at her friend with a long, exhaustive stare. "And did you say you long, exhaustive stare. And did you say you were a widow?" raising her eyebrows.

"I said that I had lost my husband three years ago, which I fancy he imagines to mean year!"

"And after?" said Mary, briefly.
"Well, then he was inclined to be very sympathetic, but I soon put an end to all that by telling him that I would take it as a personal favour if he never alluded to my husband in any way whatever!"

"Well, I must say you have plenty of nerve," gasped Mary.

"Have I not ?" triumphantly; "and then he asked if he might be enrolled as a friend. What do you think of that?" waving a lilywhite hand towards her companion, with a gesture of imperious interrogation.

And you said-"And I said certainly not. Fancy such a suggestion the third time of meeting, and fancy Fancy such a him trying to strike up a friendship with a pretty widow like me"—laughing—"when all the time he has a wife in the background !-my precious self. Again, imagine me in two characters-wife and widow! Imagine me trying to destroy my own domestic peace as the gay Mra. Hill, and then coming down-rigid virtue and outraged feelings-the cast-off wife in the shape of Lady Rayouhill herself ! Wouldn't he eyes?"

"I should rather imagine he would," assented her companion, quietly. "And when is this little comedy or tragedy coming of? When are you going to declare yourself !

"Never," returned Nellie, shutting her dressing-case with a loud bang. "Never, my dear. He will go away and torget Mrs. Hill, who nearly snapped his nose off, and never guess how near he was to Eleanor Lady Ravenbill!"

"Nonsense! nonsense!" said her friend, jumping up impatiently. "Of course he will find out who you are yet; and indeed, I think I'll give him a hint-

"If you ever do, Mary," interrupted her companion hastily, "I'll never speak to you again. Let well alone. We are very well as we are. Please, please don't meddle."

'I know it is fatal to mix oneself up with married people; but Nellie, dear, it seems flying in the face of Providence. You have your eyesight restored to you—you are twenty, pretty, and everything you ought to be!"
"Extremely obliged," making a deep curtsey.
"And it is as plain as can be that he likes you very much."

"But he has no business to like me, you bad girl, when he thinks I am Mrs. Hill and he has a wife already; it is most improper and abomin-

"Perhaps he knows who you are," suggested

Mary, serencely.

"The fates forbid!" turning pale at the thought. "No! no, there is no fear of that. Next time we meet I shall certainly ask him about his wife!"

You won't !" incredulously.

"Won't I? and you shall hear where she is as far as he knows, and all about her," nodding her head encouragingly,

"Then you are really not going to declare yourself?"

Certainly not : why should I ! It is not in I like my liberty and he likes his, you the bond. may be sure!"

Don't you think him awfully nice and goodlooking?

'Hem! middling," (Oh! Nellie, what a

I think he is one of the handsomest men I ever saw," said Mary, emphatically.

"Oh! fie, Mary; not nearly as handsome as Charley," mischievously.

Charley is a dear fellow, but not a bit goodlooking you know very well; in fact, to every one but me he is plain."

Plain, is he ! Well, never mind, handsome is that handsome does, and, by the way, I hope, talking of handsome people, that my dress will be down from Madame Elise no later than tom row night, for the Dragoons' ball on "Pancadas I." Toursday !

"Do you think he will be there?" inquired Mary, eagerly.

Who, Charlie?"

" What nonsense! Your husband of course." "Hush I the walls have ears. I dareeny he will, as he says he likes dancing, and if he is abould not be surprised if for once I was to in dulge in a mild firtation. Fancy flirting with one's husband of three years' standing and more," mak-ing a grimace at herself in the glass, "Won't it be funny ?"

"If you don't take care you will burn your finmadam, and be caught in your own trap, said Mary, impressively. "And what is what you so pleasantly call my own trap," if I may ask?" she said,

"I think you are going to make your hus band fool ecough to fall desperately in love with his own wife, and then throw him over at the eleventh hour, in order to avenge yourself on him for some imagined wrongs.

"Imagined wrongs!" she echoed. you know about it, my dear girl. O me along," taking her arm and sweeping out of the apartment. "There's the dinner bell, and as I had no ten I am quite ready for my evening

"Horrid, prosaic little wretch," sai Mary, nching her car. "No more heart, and no more pinching her ear. sentiment in your body than that door.

"On! not so hard as all that. I could not hold my cup and saucer this afternoon, my hand shook so. So you see there is hope for her yet, I am pretty had when I have to forego what I like almost better than dinner and breakfast put And then she broke into song,- ii (live, oh! give to me A sweet and fragrant cup of tea."

The next day the saunterers on the Parade had omething new to stare at. The Marquis of Westbury had come round with his yacht, and disembarked several very amart-looking people, who were up at the "Genville Arms" for a few days, while the yacht underwent some slight repairs.

There were Lord and Lady Westbury, Mrs. Burton Montagu, Mrs. Derwent, Mr. Corballis, and Sir Octo Browne.

Their costumes made many people stare and turn their heads, as they walked down the Parade, and criticised the appearance of everyone in rather loud tones.

Mrs. Burton Moutagu was attired in a bright red cloth tailor-made suit, which had a most startling effect; a wide-brimmed sailor hat, with a red ribbon and a red parasol, completed her get up."

Ludy Westbury was dressed in a bright blue erge, braided with gold; and Mrs. Derwe to was comparatively quiet in a well-fitting dark blue costume, with a white waistcoat.

As they talked, and laughed, and lounged along, they hailed with delight the approach of a friend, and "spoke him," or hailed him, as they would

"Why Ravenhill! Why, old bird! What wind has blown you to these parts!" demanded Lord Westbury of his brother peer, with a loud resounding slap on the back the was accosted with equal effusion by the three ladies, especially, needless to say, by Amy, who looked up into his face with her most confidential smile, and murmured,-

Dear Hugh, who would have expected to meet you here ?

"We are so glad to see you! It's a perfect godsend to meet a 'familiar' in this very slow-looking place! Come along," said Lady Westbury, come and walk between Amy and me, and tell about yourself. We thought you had gone "No, I'm not going this season, I believe."
"You believe!" mimicking his accent, "And what is the attraction here? Come now, 'confession is good for the soul."

At this instant they met and passed Mrs. Hill and Mary, who were suddenly confronted by these brilliant strangers, and who passed Lord Ravenhill with a emile and a bow.

"Hullo!" said Sir Otto, now speaking for the first time at the full pitch of a naturally robust organ. "What a stunning pretty girl, the one in white! So that's the attraction, is it, eh! old fellow? You need not blush. I admire your taste. Any more of the same pattern in these parts?" facetiously.

Lord Baverbill, needless to state, did not relish this graceful bit of badinage at all, neither did Mrs. Derwent, who glanced back, in defiance of all polite customs, after the two girls who were going up the Parade—tall, alight, and well-dressed; thorough ladies every inch to judge from their walk and appearance.

" Which of them is it, Hugh ?" she inquired, with a spiteful little smile.

"The one in white, of course," put in Sir Otto with a laugh; "she was by long chalks the best

"Ah! we must find out who she is, and all about her," said Constance, sweetly. "You will have to bring them to call on us at the Granville, Hugh, if they are friends of yours! Bring them to see us, do!"

"Hardly worth their while when you are only here for a few days," he returned, somewhat ungraciously.

nogradously.

"Oh, I say! Now don't be childish," said Lady Westbury, frankly; "share your good things with us, and don't be greedy. I should like to see more of that girl with the pretty gray eyes. So as you know I am not a person to be devied, you will have to get her to come round and call at the Granville this very afternoon—the sooner we all know each other the better. You all agree with me," looking smiltingly round the circle, who were now standing in ingly round the circle, who were now standing in a group, and taking up the best part of the midthe Parade, as if it was their exclusive private property.

The idea was carried with acclamation, but Lord Ravenhill would not commit himself further than by saying he would "see about it" next

Lady Westbury, backed up by Mrs. Derwent, was so very insistent, that at last Lord Ravenhill had to hint to Mrs. Fortescue that some friends of his were staying at the Granville, and he would be very glad if she would call on them, which she did accompanied by Mary-Mary only-for Nellie did, accompanied by Mary—Mary only—for Nellie bad declared once for all that she would not go and "wait upon them," as she called it. She did not like the look of them; they seemed bored and fast, and did not appeal to her in any way. She and Mary had not failed to remark them that morning on the Parade, and made a mental note that "they did not think much of Lord

The bold, black-eyed woman looked the worst, they agreed—her face was so white, her eyes so aunken.

She looked like a tragedy queen, with the manners of a barmaid. Nellie's absence was a great disappointment to the party in general, and a great relief to Lord Ravenbill in particular.

Somehow, although she snubbed him so, he did not want pretty, girlish-locking, unsophisticated Mrs. Hill to be intimate with "these people," as he called them to himself.

What was it about her that was so taking?

Everything he told himself, frankly—her face, her smile, her eyes, her pretty figure, and her merry laugh.

How could she laugh and look so happy and careless if she had gone through a sea of trouble, as hinted by Captain Fortescue?

Some people were of an elastic nature, and cast all their cares behind them-and perhaps she was one of them.

When he had left Mrs. Fortescue at her own door, he went out for what he called "a lively breather" on the downs; hired a nag from a door, he went out for what he called "a lively breather" on the downs; hired a mag from a livery stable, and started for a solitary gallop, partly to get away from this incubus at the Granville, if not altogether.

"There is nothing like a good rousing gallop for cleaning away the colwebs," he said to himself, as he brought his panting borrowed steed to a walk at the bottom of a long slope.

Let diagnosering over the exect of it he ways to

Just disappearing over the crest of it he saw a lady, followed by a groom.

Could it be Mrs. Hill? Mrs. Hill!" he said "Could it be Mrs. Hill! Mrs. Hill!" he said to himself, impatiently. "I seem to have her on the brain; every fair-haired girl I take to be Mrs. Hill. I don't even know it she rides. However, we shall soon see," and coming up at a smart canter, he did see, and it was Mrs. Hill, riding a very handsome black hunter and looking charging in a neat brown hunter, and looking charming in a neat brown riding habit.

"This is a stroke of good luck, Mrs. Hill," he said, joining her, and taking off his hat. "May I be your except, for want of a better?" "Oh, certainly," she answered, with a pretty little nod. "It is rather dull work always riding by oneself."

Does Miss Fortescue not ride then !" riding up confidentially close.
"No, she is afraid, and bates it, for one thing,

"This, I suppose, is your own animal," pointing at her handsome, well-bred mount—" not hired?"

"Yes; Blackbird is my own," patting his back and so is Butterfly, the one the groom is on. I keep them at livery stables not far from Marine Parade.

Lord Ravenhill glanced at Butterfly, another fine horse, who must have cost three figures at the least, and remembered that Mrs. Hill was a richly-jointured widow, and held his tongue.

She looked to her greatest advantage in the saddle, and rode well, and seemed perfectly at her case as Blackbird capered and shied and jumped in pure exuberance of youth and spirits.

"He has not been out for ages!" she said, apologetically, as he shied at a cheep right across the other horse. "If you don't mind we will have a gallop, and I'll take it out of him," and in another moment away they went at the top of their speed, with the wind whistling past their riders' cars, and the springing, green turfunder

Mra. Hill was no mere Rotten-row rider. put Blackbird over several sheep hurdles in a very workmanlike manner, and elicited a further amount of admiration and respect from her astonished cavalier, who half an hour ago was not aware that riding was among her accomplishments.

ho

ack

offe

Riding was, of all others, the accomplishment in a woman that took him by storm, being a very keen first flight man himself, and spending from November till April in eager and daily pursuit, Sundays excepted of the sport of kings I

"I had no ides you were such a first-rate horsewoman, Mrs. Hill!" he said, as, slightly out of breath, and flushed with their late gallep, she

"Oh, I'm not much yet," she answered in a disparaging tone. "I never was on anything but a pony till about two years ago."
"Then you never rode until after your hus

"Hush! I told you never to mention him!

she said impatiently. "Next time you forget we shall be cuts-" nodding her head impres-

"All right," he said, laughing, "I'll remem-ber. And you never rode anything but a pony before!"

Yes, when I was a child; but I used to stick on very well; and a pony is twice as hard to ride as a horse—it twists and turns round so sharply under you, and they mostly have such awful mouths!"

"Yes, quite true. You would not ride so well now if you had not served a good appren-ticeship to the pony, and where did you say!"

"I did not say anywhere," she answered, with a laugh; "and I do not see why you are to have all the questions to yourself. I am going to take a leaf out of your book," she continued, looking at him under her long eyelashes. "Is it true, Lord Ravenhill that you are a married

It a shell had exploded on the grass beneath him he could not have been more taken aback than he was by this simple question. However, after a second's hesitation, he found his voice, and said very quietly,-

"Quite true, I am a Benedict, but how did you know ?"

How! how!" he saked himself anxiously. Not that he had any real desire to conceal the fact, but he had almost lost sight of it latterly himself.

himself.

"Ob, a little bird told me," she said, coolly settling her reins. "That is question number one. Now tell me"—leaning towards him in a pretty, confidential attitude—" where is Lady pretty, confidential attitude --Ravenhill ?"

I don't know," he answered, gloomily gnawing his moustache.

Nor care !" she inquired, with a mischievous

Well, since you will have it, nor care," he

What a model husband !" knocking a fl yoff her horse's shoulder. "Now tell me some-thing else. How does she put up with such treatment?"

"Come, now, Mrs. Hill, this is not fair," he id, in a tone of deep expostulation. "You said, in a tone of deep expostulation. "You won't let me speak of your hus-I mean-I'm sure I beg your pardon-past, and yet I'm to tell you all my domestic affairs. Now, I call that hard lines !

'Not a bit of it," cheerfully. "However, I will only ask one more question, and that is, Does your wife approve of your making overtures of friendship to pretty girls—for I am only a girl

'I'm sure I can't say, but I don't suppose she would care

"I shouldn't like it if you were my husband, -you know," with a killing smile, and another look from underneath her eyelashes.

What is the harm of friendship ? It's not as was—was—was," stammering and getting if I was rather red.

Was what ? Come!"

"Making love to you, since I may speak plainly !

"No, of course not," scornfully : "but somehow friendship between a young married manlike you.—I speak plainly too, you see, and boldly —for I'm twice as bold on horseback as anywhere Friendship between you and a young matron like me," smiling and blushing very much is not looked on with favour by the world at large-now is it ?

The sort of friendship that I offer you would be," he answered, doggedly. "What I mean—I ask for nothing—only if ever you were in trouble or danger of any kind to come and help you. I ack you to feel—since you told me the other day you were alone in the world—that, in any crisis, you may know that you can always fall back upon see. There is no harm in that. I ask for no return."

"But why should you make such a strange offer to an almost total stranger?" knocking off another fly; "or is it a little way you have?"

You are no stranger to me now. I cannot explain it. I feel as if I had known you for

Certainly Hugh was getting hot and Nellie grew atrangely red.

"I cannot tell what it is that makes me like you, for as a rule I hate women like poison."
"Thank you!" nodding her acknowledgment with a smile

"I suppose there is some odd sort of affinity

"Us!" she cried, heartily. "Please speak for yourself." between us

"Well, I will! I cannot tell how it is; but' -taking his courage in both hands-" I like you better than any girl I ever saw. That day on the beach I felt it the instant I spoke to you. We cannot help ourselves! "he concluded, lamely, but in a tone of deep conviction.

Can we not ! I wonder what your wife would say, if she could hear you?

" I don't care if she did," recklessly; " I would repeat every word I have said to you this after-noon to her, and not feel the least afraid. In fact, I don't care if the whole town of Seabeach heard me "-defiantly.

"But I should care very much indeed! Faucy what they would say of me, if they heard a married man telling me he liked me better thau any girl he ever met in his life, and that he did not care if his wife heard him? By-the by, what is she like?" looking at him curiously.

"She-she-I don't know; in short, as you are so inquisitive, I may as well tell you that I have never seen her." she echoed, turning her lovely face full on him. "What are you saying? Just think."

"I married my cousin, and succeeded to my uncle's fortune as an inducement. She is blind and wore a veil. I never saw her face. We parted by her wish at the church door for ever, she said, never to meet again,

"And you have never met since ?"

" Never

"Have you no idea where she is?" "No. I often tried to discover, through our man of business, but in vain. She is abroad, I fancy. I heard she was at Aix-les-Bains three years ago, and was likely to remain on the continent. Really a miserable state of affairs, is it not !" he asked, gravely.

"Would you not like to see her?" she asked, without making any direct reply to his ques-

Yes, I should. I've often asked myself if I was not a mercenary wretch to make such a

And you were!" put in Mrs. Hill, can-

"I was in debt-that was it. Awfully hard up-and there was no other way-" No other way than this blind woman's fortune-ch?

"Yes," he assented. "I feel degraded when I think of it. I have often wondered if something could not be done to her eyes—if she might not regain her sight. It would be terrible to sit night and day in outer darkness."
"Terrible indeed!" assented Nellie, so forcibly that he gazed at her in astonishment,

You speak as if you knew all about it," he

"I do," she returned, "and no one pities the blind so much, or feels as keenly for them as "Well now, you know all about her," he said, as they came in sight of the town. "And no you despise me as a heartless, mercenary wretch. But I am more to be pitied than you imagine. I have no sisters, no cousins, and, so to speak, no wife. I am, and ever have been, faithful to her in word and deed. I am for ever cut off from love and home—a real home—like other men. I seem to be defiting aimiessly about the world—dead. But I'm boring you, I know, talking so much about myself."

"Not at all," she said, eagerly. "I like it.

And you have no womankind at all?"
"No, not one, and there is not a woman in the world-except, perhaps, one-who wo

"Who is that one?" sheasked, quickly, "your wife ?"

"My wife!" with a short laugh. "No."
"Then who!" pertinaciously. "Since you have told me so much, tell me all," coaxingly. Since I have told you so much I will tell you no more. You would !! You would be too wile ; you would smiling, "be dangerous!"

"Well, listen to me, Lord Ravenhill," she said, after a silence, suddenly reining up her horse at the end of a lane just before they came into the town; "you offered me your friend-ship the other day; and," putting out her pretty little gloved hand, "on second thoughts, accept it, and here is my hand on the bar-

Twenty minutes later she threw open the door of here and Mary's joint bedroom, exclaiming, "Guess whom I've been riding with all the afternoon?" to sing her hat and whip on her bed; "I give you six guesses, my dear."

"Your husband, of course!" promptly.

"Your husband, of course 1" promptly.
"Clever girl! but you must not call him that on any account.

"And had you a pleasant ride? But I need not sak."

Yes, quite charming. He is a first-rate horseman, and I've come to the conclusion that—that I like him very much indeed—as a friend."

CHAPTER XIL

It was the night of the Dragoons' Ball, and Mrs. Fortescue and son and daughter were patiently waiting in the hall for Nellie. Pre-sently she came tripping down the wide staircase in Madame Elise's ball-dress, carrying an enormous white bouquet in her hand, looking everything that her best friends could

Her gown was white silk and tulle and silver in her hair were three superb diamond stars, and round her throat a rivière of the same bright stones—family jewels, never worm before,

"How do I look!" she asked, running down the last few steps, and making a deep curtsey to Mrs. Fortescue, who sat on a hall chair in regal splendour.

"You look charming, my dear! Your dress is perfect, and your diamonds magnificent !" said

Mrs. Fortescue, affectionately.

He won't recognise them. I suppose !" Mary, in a lower tone, as she helped her friend a long, white satin cloak, lined with soft into white fur.

"No, no! my dear! He never saw them; they belonged to the other side of the house! You need not be alarmed."

"You will take the shine out of everybody to-night," said Teddy, staring hard at her stare, as he helped her into the brougham. "How they flash and shine. I've never seen them before! Been in pawu?" facetiously.
"No!" returned Neilie, laughing; "this is their first appearance for years!"

"I'm sure the Dragoons ought to feel highly honoured," he said, mockingly.
"Of course they will be! Mind you tell them!" impressively.

"By the way, I suppose those queer friends of Ravenhill's will be here to night? I shall go in for Mrs. Burton Montagu. I'm sure she's good said Captain Fortescue.

"Why not the black-eyed beauty !" suggested his sister, with a laugh.

his eister, with a laugu,
"Oh! It strikes he that she has other fish to fry—and any way, I don't admire her. She looks a dangerous volcanic sort of individual. looks a dangerous volcanic sort of individual.

I'll leave her to Ravenhill. Here we are, By George! what a crowd! The whole street is blocked. There are some people getting cut and walking. What a hurry they are in! The Westbury lot, of course

Ten minutes later, when they made their way under the porch, and up the red-carpeted steps, and into the ladies' dressing room, they found and into the ladies dressing room, they found Lady Westbury and her two friends still in possession of the cheval glass, arranging their dresses, their hair, and their complexions. Mrs. Burton, in deep red again, Lady Westbury in black, Mrs. Derwent in old gold satin and tulle, very low in the neck, and with two straps for with two straps for slasves across her round, white shoulders; sarderes across across and rolling white and in her hand a scarlet bouquet. She looked like Cleopatra, only wanting the sap; but that she carried, had people but known, under her tongue—behind her large, equare white teeth.

The party exchanged a few words with Mrs. The party exchanged a new words with also Fortescue, stared bundly and exhaustively at the pretty slight in the white cloak; and were presented to firs. Hill." When Mrs. Hill removed her we had a drees! It filled them what diamonds i had a drees! It filled them with rage and envy, as their six eyes took in every item of the pretty figure before them. This Mrs. Hill looked quite a girl-was not a bit made up ! No, and evidently had heaps of money !

"Your married daughter, Mrs. Fortescue, I presume?" said Mrs. Derwent, aweelly.

and from the daughter, hirs. Fortescue, it is aid Mrs. Derwent, sweetly. turned Mrs. Fortescue, hastily, moving away so as to make room for the crowds of shawled and cloaked ladies, old and young, who had come gramming in as the music had struck up, and the ball had commenced. Mrs. Fortescue and her two young ladies passed out after Lady Westerbury and her and found Lord Ravenhill on the landing, evidently waiting for someone. How well he looked in evening dress, with a white flower in his

Before he had time to address anyone, Mrs. Derwent accosted him eagerly, saying, as she seized him,-

"Oh, Hugh! How nice of you to be here to meet us; we bardly know anyone. Come along " —taking his arm confidentially—"I am going to give you the first Lancers and half-a-dozen realtyse." waltzes Nellie, who was standing behind them, heard this generous offer with her own astonished ears.

"Hugh," too! Could this Mrs. Derwent, this bold-looking woman with the bare shoulders, be the one woman he had so mysteriously alluded

What an odious, forward, hateful creature! The crowd was such that Lord Ravenhill and to! his partner were carried away by it, and Nellie fell back on Teddie, who escorted her to where the hosts received their guests.

At the entrance to the fine old oak-lined Townhall, which was lit up by a profusion of wax-candles, and decorated with banners, and flags, and flowers, and already filled with a very gay and brilliant company, Nellie was speedily sur-rounded by partners; her card was full when the first Lancers was over, and Lord Ravenbill, with Mrs, Derwent atili clinging to his arm, came up and begged for the honour of a dance.

"I am very sorry," she replied, holding up her rogramme, "but I have not one to give you. rogramme. 'ou can see yourself."

Oh, nonsense!" he exclaimed, impatiently; "I must and will have a dauce! You must throw over somebody, if the worst comes to the worst!"

No, no!" she returned with a shake of her d. "I am not so shabby, nor so faithless!"
Oh, but—"he was beginning to expostu, when Mrs. Derwent interrupted him petuhead.

"My dear Hugh! How can you be so foolish and so conceited as to expect Mrs. Hill to throw over her partners-probably her most particular friends—for a stranger like you, and I am not going to lose any more of this delicious waltz, so come along!" and Mrs. Hill's partner, who had and I am not been boiling over with impatience, was evidently of the same opinion, for in another second she found herself floating round the room.

After two turns round that large apartment

ehe paused to take breath and look on.
There was Toddy and one of the Seabeach belles, Mary and Charlie, and coming round this way, her husband and Mre. Derwent.

How well they both danced—so easily and quietly-but what an odious way the woman held heraelf! with her head almost resting on his shoulders-almost, as it were, reclining in his

She smiled a slow smile of soft contented triumph into Nellie's disapproving face as she floated gracefully by.

She had taken possession of Hugh for the evening—he knew it well! She was like an octupus-there was no shaking her off.

Ouce upon a time he hugged these chains, and was supremely happy in her society. Now the yoke was galling to the last degree, and he hated Mrs. Derwent secretly in his heart-shrank from her-avoided her on every possible occasion ; but the more he did so the more eagerly and persistently she pursued him. Would she ever learn that the old, old story was over and done with years ago and the book closed—never to be opened again ?

She would not. She closed her eyes to the fact, shut her ears to everything that might awaken her common sense, and tried to believe in her heart that he was as much her slave as

Of course, now he was a married man, he had become less outspoken, more prudent, and, com-paratively speaking, cool; but that her vanity told her was merely a cloak to disguise his real feelings, which were as warm as ever. Lady Ravenbill was, she believed, an idiot, and an invalid, who could not live for ever. Hugh was now wealthy, and in every way a desirable match, and how she hoped that his wife would die soon Meanwhile he must not be taking up any foolish passing fancies for pretty little widows like Mrs. Hill. No, no! It would be her care to guard against all that kind of thing, and keep guard against as him out of scrapes! Hugh himself was spending a most unsatis-tive himself was spending. How was he to factory, miserable evening. How was he to shake off Cohny? She had no friends to whom he could pass her on! She was a stranger in the seemed to have no wish to extend her acquaintance, and to be perfectly content with him as her partner for the evening. He watched with angry, envious eyes, pretty Mrs. Hill dancing dance after dance with dragoou after dragoon-or the centre of an admiring little circle-evidently enjoying herself immensely. last he gave up dancing, and declared somewhat abruptly that he would sit it out—sitting out suited Conny perfectly well—and she led him to large balcony, covered in with an awning, and full of cosy deep chairs, and stands of flowering shrubs. Here he threw himself into the nearest seat, resigned to fate, and resigned to Conny's long outpourings of her feelings-her solitude, her craving for companionship, her affection for old friends, her memories of the days that were no more; whilst he contented himself with dropping an occasional Yes and No, which was all that her conversation required to keep it in full tide.

Once or twice he politely strangled a yawn behind his white-gloved hand, and more than once he devoutly wished that Comy would not sit so very close to him. There was room on the sofa for half-a-dozen, he told himself irritably, and why did she hold her fan up before both their faces so mysteriously; "Wby!" In fact, if this kind of thing was to go on all night he could not stand it. He would plead sudden illness, fever and ague, bleeding at the nose, any-thing to shake off this woman of the sea, and go home to the yacht and go to bed. So much for the evening he had been looking forward to with such pleasure-daucing and talking to and sitting out with his little friend Mrs. Hill. thinking all these things, that young lady herself and one of her hosts came into the verandah breathless after a long waltz, and seated them-selves in two low wicker chairs just opposite, laughing and chattering gay nonsense. At first Nellie did not recognise the couple opposite, but the yellow dress and red bouquet soon struck And then who was the man! who was perdu behind the huge black fan, and sitting so affectionately close to Mrs. Derwent, she whispered into his sympathetic car ! Who but Lord Ravenbill !

Who but Lord Ravenbill?

"Rather a case that, ch?" said her warrior friend, following her eyes. "We are almost de trop here," laughing; "but I don't see why they should have such a jolly place all to them-res, do you, eh?" Mrs. Hill made some kind of mechanical consent; the picture opposite had an odiousindignation and surprise, as she kept her eyes thad on that big fan. She was not jealous, she told herself eagerly. Oh, dear no! It was nothing to her, of course, but she certainly did not like to see her husband making a fool of himself with that horrid, bold, fast woman. Suddenly Hugh happened to raise his head from a critical study of the carpet, and drew himself back from the protecting fan.

He fairly started as he was confronted by that pretty little fair contemptuous face opposite, and coloured like a schoolboy in his turn with shame and annoyance.

Look here, Conny !" he said, abruptly. "Have we not been here about long enough, don't you think, eh ? Come along down and I'll get you some supper;" and jumping up, and offering his arm with great alacrity, be led her from the balcony down below to the supper-

As he was busily supplying her very large appetite he encountered Teddy, who had eaten and was filled, and looked a happy, contented gentleman at large.

"For mercy sake, Teddy," he implored, as he eved a nate for his partner. "Take Mrs. Dercarved a pate for his partner. "Take Mrs. Der-went off my hands for a while; she has stuck to me like a burr the whole evening, and I've had more than my share.

"I thought you liked it, so I did not interfere," said his friend, with a lazy laugh.

"Liked it, I'm nearly crazy with the sound of her tongue, and if you don't rescue me like a good man and true, I'll leave this scene of revelry, for I can't stand it any longer. I've offered to introduce her to fellows, but she would not hear of it

-no such luck." Saw through your little game I suppose,

"Rather, I imagine; and now look here, Teddy! You come up and ask her to dance, and mind you take no refusal. She dances Al, too," encouragingly.

"But, my dear sir—"
"Never mind dear sirring me, you must do it.
"Never mind dear sirring me, you must do it. You've had your fun this evening, and it's hard lines if I am not to have any."

"By fun I suppose you mean dancing with Mrs. Hill, but it will be no go. Her card is full hours

"Are you down among the lucky ones?"
"I am, of course!" emphatically.
"Well, then, you'll just give me your dance. I'll do as much for you another time,

"Upon my word I like your cheek. I'm to take over your partner and you mine! You are a cool chap, and no mistake."
"Here!" interrupted the other, hastily;

"I've no time to stop and argue. Come away after me and be introduced," stalking away towards Mrs. Derwent with a well-filled plate in

In the meanwhile Nellie and her partner were sitting in the balcony discussing that late

"That's a good-looking fellow, Ravenhill, is he ot," said Nellie's partner, Captain Bohun. I remember him when he was in the First Life. He went the pace then, and no mistake; and only his old uncle died in the very nick of time, only his old under died in the very those of and, and left him a pot of money, he would have been up no end of a tree."

"Really!" indifferently.

"Yes, he is an awfully good fellow—very popular with fellows. I thought that old business with Mrs. D. was all over ages ago," he added, reflectively.

"What old business?" demanded Nellie, with rising colour.

"Oh, four or five years ago he was deadly spoony on her, and then he cooled off; in fact, it was rumoured that he was married. Maybe you have heard the story?" crossing his legs comfortably.

"Married! Really!" said Nellie, assuming an air of intense astonishment.

"Yes, to some cousin or other; but as she has never been seen I'm inclined not to believe it myself. Someone would have seen his wife in the course of three or four years, but I've never met a soul who had either heard horrible fascination for her. She coloured with of her or laid eyes on her. Looks rather

"It certainly looks odd ! " assented Lady

Ravenhill, coolly.
"Yes, the only thing is, he never has shown any desire to marry anyone else, nor paid anyone any attention all this time, and he is now rather a parti, and ought to marry on account of the title and estate, you know; but as he never goes in for ladies much now it makes me cometimes faccy there is a wife—not presentable, of course—in the background."

"Then you say he was very much in love with Mrs. Derwent, once upon a time?"

"Awfully ! but that was when he had not a shilling, and now he has thousands. He does not seem to fancy her so much—the way of the world, eh ?"

"But they say one always returns to one's first love," said Nellie, carelessly.

"Don't believe a word of it—any way he won't—seemed shockingly bored just now; and once a woman begins to bore a man it's all u p."

"I did not think he looked bored," replied

Nellie, decidedly.

"Ah, but he was. You may not know the play of his features as I do—in fact of course you don't—as I suppose you never saw him before; and, talk of the deuce, here he is. Ravenhill, we've been just discussing you."
"Very good of you, I'm sure," bowing. "I hope you let me off cheap."
"Oh, so so—better than you deserved. We were saying how immensely you appeared to be enjoying yourself just now—improving the shining Lour to any extent," said Captain Bohun, shaing Lour to any extend, jocosely, "Enjoying myself immensely, as you say," he responded somewhat stiffly. "Mrs. Hill, I have come to beg for one dance," he added, turring to his wife; "only one—I was behindhand in getting my name put down when we first came in. I missed you on the stairs."

"But I assure you that my card is full," said Neille sweetly.

Nellie, sweetly.

"Fortescue says I may have his-this next waltz-as a great favour-if you have no objec-tion," he persisted, and he apoke so resolutely and looked so determined that it was easy to see

he was not a man to be denied.

Oh! if Captain Fortescue chooses to pass me on like this "-rising-" of course there is no more to be said," with a little aggrieved laugh. Then I shall say au revoir," turning to Captain Bohun, with a smile; and, taking her husband's arm, she descended to the ball-room, and in two minutes more they had plunged into the thickest of the fray-his arm round her waist-her hand Not so good-not so experienced a waltzer as Mrs. Derwent, Nellie still was light as a feather, had a natural taste for the amusement, and danced well; besides this, anyone would have denced well with Lord Ravenhill, a cele-brated leader of cotillons, and one of the best partners in London. Firm, and steady, and cool, he knew when to go the pace, when to slacken, when to cut in between two blundering couples, and when to stop, and his step was perfection itself-so all the girls said when they compared itself—so all the girls said which most cover their hair-brushing operations that "they knew no one they liked as well for a partner as Hugh Ravenhill—he held you so nicely too, and nothing ever knocked him out of time or step." Round and round and round, they went easily and lightly to La Perceuse waltz. At last it wailed out its very last bars; and Nellie, panting slightly and flushed was led off to the supper-room by her partner, who selected a charming little table for two-made raids on the waiters, and having got the wherewithal of a charming little supper took his place as her vis-à-vis. Soup was despatched, lobster mayonnaise, and iced pudding. A good deal of desultory conversation was made between

"It would have been rather too much of a good thing if he had not had one dance. Would it not?" he asked, imperiously.
"Oh! I don't know," she replied, gaily.
"Why not?"

I had no idea your little ladyship was in such demand, or I would not have been let in; but your card was crammed, and you were beset with a mob of fellows before you were five minutes in the room.'

"And as for you, you were engaged on the lauding," she said, with a knowing smile.

"Oh, you heard her!"—reluctantly. "Well, you know, she is an old friend," apologetically;

you know, she is an old friend," apologetically; "eo it's rather different."

"Oh! Fray "—spreading out her pretty little hands beseechingly—"don't make any excuses to me. But what would your wife say if she heard a lady engaging you for six waltzes in one breath?"

"I'm very sorry I ever told you anything about my wife," he said, impatiently. "I suppose now you will be always harking back to "What would she say?"

don't care about talking of her, if you don't," frankly; but breaking up bread-crumbs into quite a pile, she added, "Of course, Mrs. Derwent is the one woman you spoke of yester day. Tell me something about her. She has the use of her eyes"—most emphatically—"and will be far more interesting than Lady Ravenhill. Have you known her long?"

Here you go with your cathechism again," smiling under his moustache.

Ten years! Why, then, she must be quite "Old in comparison to you; but still young enough. How old, then, do you think I am ?" asked Nellie, playfully.

"About one or two-and-twenty," he replied looking at her reflectively.

"And how old are you?" she asked.

"Oh, quite elderly. I shall be thirty next

"And Mrs. Derwent was your first love," she said, in a quiet matter-of-fact voice, "so I have been told."

"People must always find something to say," he exclaimed, angrily. "First lave is all humbug."

"Do you think so? I am sorry for that," with raised brows.

"Then may I ask what is your experience,

"I have none—absolutely none. Nay, you need not look as if you did not believe me; it is a fact. I've never been the smallest scrap in love, and know no more about it personally than this table.

"And yet you married," indignantly.

"And yet," pushing away her chair, "as you say I married, so for that matter did you."

(To be continued.)

TWO GIRLS.

-- 10:--

CHAPTER XVII.

GLADYS NAIRN walked quickly upstairs, the Professor followed more leisurely; he was an old man, and his pace was never very hurried, besides, the stairs at Tregarthan Mansions were steep-economy, rather than ease, having been studied in their architecture. The Professor had quite lost sight of his young friend, when suddenly he heard a piercing shriek, and rushed on forgetting his age and feebleness, feeling pretty sure something was the matter.

On the landing immediately below that occupied by his young friends, he passed a gentleman who was descending the stairs, a tall, fine-looking man, well-dressed and with an air of decided prosperity. It never came into the Professor's prosperity. It never came anto the Professor's head to connect this stranger with the shriek he had heard, his idea was that some nervous fear had seized on Gladys at finding herself alone before the locked door of her little home. He hurried on to find his poor little assistant stretched senseless on the floor, the gas jet showing her white, still face, and the blood fast flowing former a would in her side. flowing from a wound in her side.

Never in his life had the old man felt more bewildered. The door of the flat stood open, and a light within was plainly visible, yet certainly Gladya had had no time to put the key in the lock, far less to go inside and light a candle. At that moment two fellow tenants came up, a kindly well-to-do couple, who lived on the third floor, and knew the Nairne by sight. The piercing shriek had reached them and brought them up to see what was wrong.

"The gentleman said there had been an accident. What is it?" asked Mr. Barton.
"I can tell you nothing," replied the Professor.
"She was a little in front, poor child. I suddenly heard a piercing shriek and rushed up to find her-thus.

Very gently Mr. Barton raised the slender form and carried it into the flat. He laid Gladys on her own little white bed, and then said, gravely .-

"She has been stabbed by a dagger. If you will stay with her, Margaret, I will go for a doctor.

Mrs. Barton's wits were very quick.
"Alfred, that man did it. That was why he tried to prevent us from coming here."

The Professor found his voice.
"Someone has broken in. See, the little girl was coming home with the key in her pocket, and we find the door open, and the lamp lighted."

Mrs. Barton peeped into the pretty sitting-room, everything was in disorder. A desk was open on the table and the floor strewn with its contents.

"You are right," she said gravely, to the Professor, "someone has been here, but I can't understand it. People who live in a fifth floor flat don't generally tempt burglars to molest them, and those two girls were so sweet and them, and those two girls were so sweet and innocent I don't believe they could have had an enemy. New, Mr. Chester, if you'll go and light the little stove in the kitchen I'll get her into bed. My husband will be back almost directly with the doctor, and then we ought to think about sending for the police."

Professor Chester obeyed the energetic lady. He was so dazed it was really a comfort to him to be told what to do. He lighted the stove and put the kettle on while Mrs. Barton got Gladys into bed, and discovered that the only wound was in the left side, some inches below the The kind hearted woman strove in vain to stop the bleeding. She longed for the doctor's coming, for she began to fear the dagger had touched some artery near the heart.

It seemed hours to the anxious watcher, but really it was only twenty minutes before Mr. Barton returned with Dr. Gill. The two were old acquaintances, and on the way the former had told the doctor all he knew of the mysterious occurrence.

Dr. Ght went straight into the bedroom. The Professor looked up anxiously at Mr. Barton.

I shall never forgive myself if she dies. I ought to have kept her in sight."

Nonsense," said the other kindly. "You couldn't possibly expect harm would come to her. we've picked up the dagger. It was lying on the stairs just below. I think there isn't a doubt the man who spoke to us is the assailant. Only I can't make out his object."

"She disturbed him, perhaps, in his wicked mark "

Mr. Barton shook his head.

"He could have run off and cluded pursuit. He must have been a madman, or else have been a personal enemy of the Nairus, only, poor girls, they always seemed so bright and light-hearted, I should have said they had not an enemy in the world."

Dr. Gill joined them with a very grave face.
"It is worse than I expected," he said, sadly.
"I doubt if she will pull through it. She is fearfully delicate, and the shock to her system is terrible, without thinking of the wound; the bledding is stopped, however, and if she can sleep she may do."
"Is she conscious?" asked the Professor.

"She was once, and asked if you were safe."
"Heaven bless her," nurmured the old man.
"She is particularly anxious her sister should not be frightened," went on the doctor, "but Miss Nairn must certainly be telegraphed to as soon as the offices open. Do you know Professor !

"Yes—she is coming home to-morrow or Friday, but it would be best to wire."
"I'll see to it if you'll give me the address," said Dr. Gill, "Mrs. Barton has promised to stay with the poor girl to-night, and I shall, be round the first thing in the morning."

"I don't grudge Miss Nairu anything my wife can do for her," said Mr. Barton; gravely, "but after what has happened I can't leave Margaret here alone; if she stays I shall speed the night on this sofa. That man might come back to finish

"You are quite right," said Dr. Gill. "Pro-fessor, you saw the man in question, will, you come with me and we will give information to the police on our way home,"

"Is it necessary! Can't we wait till Gladys is "Is it necessary? C-n't we wait till ( we'll enough to tell us what she wishes?"

My good sir, that day may never come. I have grave doubts of her recovery; we owe it to the poor girl and still more to her sister, to try and get the man identified and punished. Don't you see, these two girls are uttorly defenceless; they live alone, they seem to have not a relative in the world to look after them."

"Yes. I suppose you are right," admitted the Professor. "Well, doctor, I could swear to that man anywhere; it was an uncommon face, and there was comething out about it."

By this time it was getting late, past eleven, but when the Professor and Doctor Gill turned into the police station, an inspector was ready to hear their story.

He listened with great attention, made the Professor describe the man be had met on the stairs twice and then said slowly,— "That man is wanted for a robbery in North-shire; we only had his description this afternoon from the office there, and your account is correct in every particular except the dress—but be'd be able to change his clothes, and, indeed, buy a new rig out in a couple of hour."

"I shall be at the mansions early to-morrow," said the old Professor to Dr. Gill, "but I must go home now; my wife is not strong, and I fear she must be terrified already at my long ab-

The next day as soon as the telegraph office opened, Dr. Gill, who had already paid an early visit to Gladys, despatched the following message to May Nairn

"Return at once; your sister is ill and needs VOU.

The telegram reached Chilton Hall as the family lingered over a late breakfast. Mrs. Anstruther watched her guest's face grow suddenly white, and asked anxiously—

"Hara way had away dear"."

"Have you bad news, dear ! May put the message into her hand,

A Dr. Gill sends it. I have heard of him ; he attends some friends of ours. Gladys must be very ill for him to telegraph."

"You will catch the morning train if I belp you pack," said Mrs. Anatruther kindly. "My dear, do not look so wretched; I hope and trust you will find nothing very terrible amies."

May lifted her aweet eyes to the lady's face.
"You don't know Gladys; she is the bravest, most unsolitab girl; she wouldn't send for a doctor unless she were seriously ill, and I am sure the would not have let anyone telegraph to me if she had not been too ill to prevent it."

"And you won't see Diamond End after all," said the General kindly; "well, perhaps the next time you come to us we can manage it, and I tell you frankly the place is not what it used to be, its present chiltelaine is a wet blanket." May regretted that solemn promise to Gladys have told the General and Mrs. Anstruther her "sister" was the Gladys Keith they had so long racurned, and they would have better understood her arriety; as it was she was bound to silence. She could only thank her friends for their kindness and premise to write and let them know how she found Gladys.

The General himself drove her to the station, and it was only when she had said good-bye to him, and had fairly begun her long, lonely journey, that May had leisure to remember she had not said good bye to Owen Tudor and might never see him again.

It came as a great surprise to her to see Mr. Chester on the platform at King's Cross. She liked the Professor very much, and she knew he was really fond of Gladys, but that he should have spared time to come and meet his assistant's sister seemed an unlooked for sacrifice.
"I have a great deal to tell you, Miss Nairn,"

he said, when they were driving off in a cab

"Only tell me that Gladys is better."

"She is still alive," said the old man, "and Dr. Gill has hopes of her now. When he sent that telegram to you he thought her dying." And what is it ?

In a very few words Mr. Chester told her of the last night's tragedy. Every drop of blood seemed to leave May's face as she listened.

My poor little Gladys-I ought never to have

It could have been no ordinary rebbery," said the Professor, "for, so far as we can tell, no valuables have been taken."
"There were none to take," said May, "but what was the object if not robbery ?

"We think, at least Mr. Barton suggests, the man was looking for some papers. The drawers of the writing-table were taken out and emptied, a deak has evidently been rausacked. The theory is that Gladys disturbed the man at his evil work and he stabbed her to prevent her raising an alarm."

May looked bewildered.
"I should have said till to-day that I had not an enemy in the world."

The police declare that they are seeking a man answering to the description of the wretch I saw on the stairs. They say he is wanted for a robbery at Diamond End."

Tudor has lost several valuables," replied May, "he told us so himself. His theory was that one member of a band of thieves had visited the house to spy out the land for the others. But even the advance guard took goods worth more than a hundred pounds.

"Mrs. Barton is nursing your sister," said the Professor, "ahe and her husband came up last night, alarmed at the cry. I think you only know them slightly, but they seem very anxious about my poor little friend."

It came suddenly back to May that this was the 19th of December, the Professor's very busiest season was approaching, what would he do without his assistant?

"Don't think of me," said the kind old man as she began to express her sympathy. "It is a jusy time, and there are few girls so bright and taking as your pretty sister, but the school holidays have begun now, and I've no doubt I'll find some under-teacher who will be glad to earn

May put one hand on the Professor's as the cab stopped; a sudden awful fear had seized for, "You saw the man yourself," she breathed, "I saw him as close as I see you now. What is it, Miss May, tell me what you are thinking?

you may trust me to keep your secret.

"It was only," the poor girl's breath came in gasps; she could hardly get out the words"Gladys has had a great deal of trouble, andpeople are so cruel you know. If we can't find the man then they will say she did it herself."

"I'd knock anyone down who said it," said the Professor, more fiercely than May had thought he could speak, kind old man. "No, my dear, don't you go to worry over that, there's no such thing possible. I've not a shadow of doubt the man was there ransacking the place, and when your sister surprised him he stabbed her to prevent her giving the alarm.

Mary said no more, in her own heart she felt no thief would have imagined be should find valuables in that cheap little flat. How she wished the Brandons had been at home. She felt so utterly helpless and lonely. Then a bright thought struck her. As the Professor said, all schools had broken up, or would do so in a day or two, she would write to dear Miss Primrose and beg her kind old friend to come and help

Mrs. Barton met her at the door. The Prosor lingered to hear the last report of Gladys, and then withdrew.

"She is sleeping peacefully," said the kind, motherly woman to May, "Dr. Gill hopes we shall pull her through, but he says it is a terrible wound, and she will need the utmost care. She was delirious all last night. I would not let anyone but myself and the doctor see her to-day, lest the delicium should return.

She looked into May's eyes, and Miss Nairn knew that poor Gladys had betrayed her own secret.

"It is quite true," May said, in answer to Mrs. Bartou's glance, "Gladys is not my sister, but she and I are alone in the world. She was most anxious to hide herself from some friends who had treated her cruelly, and I thought she would be safer if I called her my sister and shared my name with her. We were two lone thought we might be happier together. Mrs. Barton stooped and kissed her. We were two lonely girls,

" I think it was the kindest thing you could have done, Miss Nairn, and don't you be afraid of my betraying you; I won't tell even my own husband. But, don't you think this gives a clue to the man who injured Gladys ?"

No. I know her whole history, and there is no one in her past who answers to the Professo description of the man on the stairs. The strangest part is that this very man is suspected of a robbery at Diamond End, close to where I have been staying."

An hour or two later Gladys opened her eyes and found her adopted sister watching by her side. A strange look of intense thankfulness came into the beautiful eyes, as she whispered,— "Oh, May, darling, are you safe? was my letter in time to warn you?"

"I am quite safe, dearie; it is you who have been in dauger, little Gladys. I must never go away and leave you again."

Gladys looked wistfully into her face. "They tell me I mustn't talk, but May, I can't rest till I have told you all." May held the little feverish hand in hers.

ira. Barton has gone home, dear, and I am nurse. I really think it will hurt you less head nurse. I really think it will hurt you less to speak than to broad over things; so tell ms what troubles you so !"

She had expected to hear the description of the man who had confronted Gladys with that terrible stab ; but Gladys clasped her hands and told May the history of her dream, of how she had heard Mrs. Montague speaking to herself by the lake, and of the cruel threat she had breathed against

May.

Miss Nairn looked very grave.

"Gladys, do you know, I fancied before Mrs.

Montague did not like me for she never sent any confirmation of Arline's invitation, and Mrs.

Anstruther told me she was a most peculiar woman. The only person she has really 'taken to 'is the surgeon, Mr. Douglas; she persists in having him at Diamond Eud continually, though none of her children can bear him; and, short of forbidding him the house Mr. Tudor has done forbidding him the house, Mr. Tudor has done his utmost to stop his visita."

Gladys shuddered. "May, I was so frightened, I seemed to think

"May, I was so frightened, I seemed to think you would go there, and my dream be fulfilled. What should I do without you, dear ?"
"Now, Gladys, you are to keep yourself as quiet as possible. I have written to my dear old schoolmistress, Miss Primrose, and begged her to come and stay with us. I shall tell her nothing of your history, except that you are a dear friend of mine, and that I have adopted you as a sister. She is such a kind old lady, and as it's holiday. She is such a kind old lady, and, as it's holiday time. I am aure she will come. She will tell me time, I am sure she will come. how to nurse you, and talk to the doctor, and all

"But where will she sleep !" asked Gladys, which practical question had never occurred to

May.
"Oh, I'll get her a room somewhere. Now, deary, do try and go to sleep."

and May hoped her patient was obeying orders, then those awest eyes opened slowly and there was a look of terror in them which cut the elder girl to the heart.

"Oh, May, save me! He is going to kill me See, he has auntie's dagger. . . We used to tell her it was dangerous.

May bent over Gladys in an agony; evidently the delirium had returned. She knew that the weapon which had wounded her darling had been picked up blood-stained on the stairs, a strange vespon-a rich triffe, made for ornament rather than use and set with precious atones, than use—and set with precious atomes.

May knew a paper knife in the form of a dagger, set with jewels, had been stolen from Diamond End. Gladys' words seemed to identify its strangely.

May's one thought was for the girl who had grown so dear to her. But when the decion paid his evening visit and spoke gravely of the patient's state, a terrible condict arose in the nurses heart. She alone knew that her adopted sister was the Gladys Keith for whom half. Northshire was any stranger of the patient's second or the state of the state o mourning.

If the worst happened, and Gladys were dying, surely she would be absolved from that terrible promise; surely if the spark of his were really Gladys would like to see one familiar face—hear one dearly-loved voice !

"I cannot speak hopefully," was the doctor's verdict. "She is a very delicate girl, and even before last night she was suffering from some chock. I am afruid she has not strength enough to battle with the exhaustion following such a loss of blood.

Assort blood."

May looked at him piteously.

"Oh, sir, save her—I wans her so !"

"I will do my utmost," he said, kindly. "I sever had a patient in whom I felt more interest; but, Miss Nairn, it would be cruel to buoy you up with false hopes, and I am very much afraid the case is beyond all human skill."

He was gone. May longed to bury her face in her hands and sob out her grief, but she dared not give herself this relief. Dr. Gill's last words were that Gladys must not be agitated; so, telling her patient she was going to tidy up the little sitting-room, and make it more fit for visitors' eyes, May set herself to repair the disorder created by that nocturnal intruder.

Her deak had evidently been overhauled; but as her mother had never written her a single line, and she had no schoolgirl correspondents, it followed that there were no letters received before she left Miss Primrose, and the few she had kept since were chiefly of a business nature. Her bank-book, her little stock of ready money, had both been left intact. A letter from Miss Primrose had evidently been carefully perused; it was one in which the dear old lady greaned over May's being "in a shop," and re-marked it was enough to make the Leighs of Woodborough sehamed of their neglect what had happened to their descendant, and she really feared her dear May had inherited plebelan tastes from her father. Across this been scored in a man's hand, in pencil, Across this letter had "If Miss Naira is wise she will not heed this foolish woman. Honest, hard work is all she has to look forward to. She need expect nothing from the Leighs or from her father's family. To be happy and successful she should forget her father's very rame and never try to trace his relations.—ONE WHO KNOWS."

May sank back into a chair. For the first time she began to believe that she might really have been the cause of the strange She knew nothing of her father, but intrusion. she had always clung to the idea had he lived she might have been proud of him. It had been her dream—her debt to Mr. Page once paid—that some one who could tell her her father's history.

So far from being turned from her purpose by this strange warning, it only made her more fiercely set on it. A strange suspicion flashed across the girl: if her father had not been the obscure drawing-master Miss Primrose believed him, but the heir of a noble family, why-was his only child and representative.

Bit by bit the dream pieced itself out in May's mind. Admit that her father was of good family, he might not have been the eldest son. When his relations refused to receive his widow and child, or afford them any help, there might have been several lives between him and the family honours; but (as she had seen in the case of Owen Tudor) fortunes did sometimes belong to people who never expected them. If such a fortune was waiting for her, what more likely than that the people who would own it if she never claimed it should try to make her believe her father poor and obscure.

The man with the dagger might be in their employ, and have come to Tregarchan Mansions to see if May had any proofs of her parentage, any certificates which would substantiate her es: this theory would explain why the desk had been ransacked.

Well, Miss Primrose would come soon, and might, perhaps, throw a little light on the se but, deep in May's own heart, was the certainty that she had hit on the right theory.

And then a cry from the inner room reached her, and she flety to her adopted sinter. Gladys was sitting up in bed, a feverish brightness in her eyes. She did not seem to recognise May or even tolece her; it was as though she were talking to someone very far away.

"Oh Duke, my darling, come back ! Oh, Duke, it was all a mistake rand I loved you after all !."

CHAPTER XVIII.

MARWADUKE BLAKE could not be said to be travelling solely for business or pleasure. His trip, was a strange combination of both. A literary man, his works were much sought after, and books of travels, or descriptions of places he had visited, found ready publishers, so that, in the heart-sickness which followed his disappointment, he left England as much to distract his thoughts from his lost love as for the sake of what he might gain in the way of inspiration for his pen.

He went to Australia first, and was delighted with the vast unknown continent. Travelling from one division to another, making friends, and eiving a warm welcome wherever he came, Colonials dearly love to entertain the English aristocracy, and so far from sharing the English objection to being put in a book, they often think it a special honour, when told a gnest meditates writing a work on their country on his return.

Duke liked the Southern hemisphere uncommonly. It was rather disturbing to his ideas to find the weather growing hotter and the days and the weather growing notice and the days getting longer as the year wore to its close; but he thoroughly enjoyed the Australian spring, and had quite made up his mind for one in his life to be too hot at Christmas; and then ha came across an old schoolfellow of his, who was running a farm near Gimpey, and induced his old friend to go home with him on a long visit.

Everyone for miles round knew the Fletchers, and the Fletchers' guest speedily became popular.

Duke found himself invited to every house within riding distance, and oftenest of all to the homestead of Mr. Page, the richest man in that part of the country, who yet managed to inspire

Duke with a strong aversion.

"I can't explain it," he told pretty Mrs.
Flatcher one day; "but I do destest that fellow.
His wife looks so miserable, you know, I can't help thinking he's a bit of a tyrant in demostic life."

"He's an out-and-out good fellow," replied Duke's hosters, "and I believe he worships the ground she walks on; but, I grant you, Mrs. Page looks unhappy, and I fancy I am the only woman in the township who knows why."

"Is it a secret?"

"Well, I don't mind telling you, because you don't live in Gimpey. I found it out by an accident. We are very intimate with the Pages; and when my little girl was born five years ago I asked Mrs. Page to be her godmother, and men-tioned we were going to call baby May. She burst into tears, poor thing, and I suppose, womanlike, I began to cry too; and then she told me she had left a little girl in England called To this day I don't know where the child is or her age or anything about her. The Pages have been out four teen years, so unless she was a baby when they left her she must be growing "Do you mean they deserted their own

She isn't his child, Mrs. Page was a widow. I fancy her first husband was something dis-reputable. Aryway, when she married again the condition was made that she gave up the little

"And you think she regrets her?"

"I see sure of it. She has six children now, but only the two youngest are girls. I believe she misses the firstborn more and more every I think she can't forgive herself for desert ing Mary. I suppose it comes to that.

"Didn't you tell me Mrs. Page was English?"
"Oh, yes; one of the Leighs of Woodburough.
Mr. Page doesn't forget to tell you that either. He's just the man to tell people his wife's grandfather was an English Baronet."

"I know the Leigha," said Duke; the present Baronet is a great croup of my father's."

"Well, you must leave off thinking Mr. Page a tyrant. He would give his wife gold to eat, he would half kill himself in her service if needful; but the one thing he won't and can't do, is to see his rival's child in his home.

It happened that not very long after this con-It happened that not very long after this conversation Duke was over at the Pages' farm, and accidentally giving his suck a many agrain, it was declared by his hot he roust not think of going back to Helmoroth. They would send a note to Mr. Flatcher, and he must put up with their company for a few days.

Duke deticed that Mrs. Page varmly endorsed her husband's invitation. Usually she was rather collections, seeming to take no interest in any colouriess, seeming to take no interest in any-thing; but it was evident from her manner she wished Duke to remain, and this was reassuring, to him, as he knew, through the farmer's many outdoor engagements, his entertainment would mainly fall on her.

She brought her work on to the verandah the second afternoon, when Duke was lying on a basket lounge, the injured foot carefully bandaged up. He put away his newspaper, and began to talk to her about the beauties of the homestend, and his admiration for Australia.

generally.

"I can understand anyone without near tles in England being well content to forsake the old country and make a home here."

Mrs. Page shook her head.

"I fancy women feel differently. However happy and prosperous they are out here, there are times when they get a strange sense of home-English village, or the bustling throbbing pulse of great London."

"Perhaps you are right. I am no free agent, could not settle out here if I would, for my father and mother are both living and would not spare me for long.

"Mrs. Fletcher was telling me," her voice "I don't think I knew Sir Angua. I know the present baronet—your nucle, I presume."

"I wish you would tell me something about him," said Mrs. Page, eagerly. "Is he married?

Has he children !

He had one son, a regular scapegrace, who did something very shady, and joined with his father to cut off the entail."

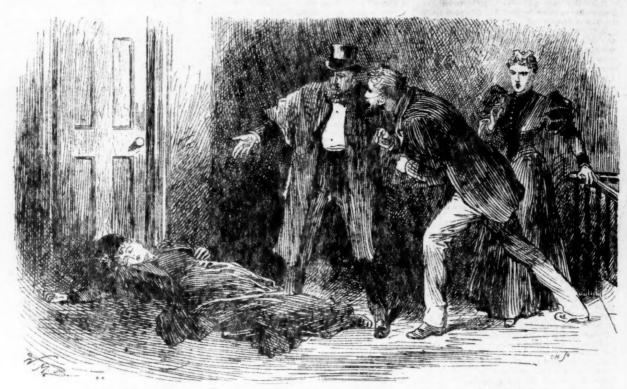

"Ah," she seemed to hesitate. "I was not thinking of money, Mr. Blake, or of any chance of my being his heiress. You can't understand, but you seem kind, and there is no one else I can ask. Tell me, do you think Sir Gilbert and Lady Leigh would be kind to a young girl. Would they be good to a lonely child just because sha of their blood, if they knew of her.

Duke shook his head.

Duke shook his read.
"They are both getting very old," he said, gravely. "Sir Gilbert is turned seventy, his wife is very little younger. My fear is they are so engressed in themselves and their own petty silments their hearts would not open to any fresh interests. Ah!" the tears had come into her eyes,

"then it would be of no use."

"Were you thinking of sending one of your children to school in England ?" saked Duke, because I am sure my mother would be glad to

"I SUDDENLY HEARD A PERCING SHRIER, AND RUSHED UP TO FIND HER-THUS!" SAID THE PROFESSOR.

send you bulletins of the young lady, and do her best to make her exile happy. My mother loves all young people, and my father is so devoted to Sir Gilbert Leigh that any relation of his would be sure of a welcome with us.

Mona Page lowered her voice to a whisper

"Mr. Blake, I am going to trust you with a secret. My eldest duld is in England. My husband defrayed the expenses of her education, but refused to allow me to write to her. He wanted me to forget my firstborn, but I am not good at forgetting. Oh, you can't tell how my heart has yearned for her. I left her with a dear old teacher of my own, and I knew that she would be well cared for, but when she grew up and learned her own story, she was so indignant she refused to owe her maintenance to us any longer. She has left school and gone out into world to earn her bread,"

Did she tell you so ?"
No, the school mistress sent back my husband's draft with an intimation that May had left her and was in London. Oh, Mr. Blake, I know what London means to a lonely woman. Think of my child, she is quite young, only a girl in her teens. Think of her alone without a relation to acknowledge her or a friend in the world."

But surely her father's family would be kind to her ?"

"They were poor and proud. My husband's only brother died young, and his widow could not be expected to feel an interest in us. She would not help me nineteen years ago, is it likely she would help May now ?"

Duke felt interested, because his own heart being sad for one lenely girl, it was but natural the sorrows of another should appeal to him. He the corows of saccast should appear to him. He took Mrs. Page's hand in his, and said kindly,—

"I shall be returning to England in a little while, if you like I will go and see your daughter (I suppose I can get her address at the school), I will tell her of her mother's love."

"Oh, if you only would."
"My mother shall ask her to Northshire," said Duke chearfully, "and we will try to make her happy. What I ashamed of her because she is ! earning her own living, not a bit of it, Mrs. Page; we Blakes are not like that."

"And you will tell her I have never ceased regretting that I gave her up. Tell her it has been the sorrow of my life.

"I will tell her," said Duke kindly, "and now it is nearly Mr. Page's time for coming home, don't you think you had better try and get a little calmer before he is here."

She smiled, and the smile made her pale face se lovely, Duke felt she must, indeed, have been beautiful before sorrow set its mark on her. He wondered what kind of man her first husband had been, and which parent May resembled. "You won't forget your promise," ple Mrs. Page, "and, perhaps, you'd take May a present from me; nothing valuable—I should not dare to send her that, but just my portrait and a few trifles. It would ease my point." a few trifles. It would ease my pain a little if I knew someone would tell the child how I loved her."

"I promise," said Duke, "and now I see Mr. Page in the distance, hadn't you better go indoors. I will try and keep him here talking to me for a few minutes, and that will give you time to compose yourself. Here is an English paper if you care to look at it."
"I thought the Missia was here" said Mr. Do-

"I thought the Missis was here," said Mr. Page, as he took a chair in the verandah, and told Duke was getting hotter and hotter, he doubted there'd be a storm.

"She has only just gone in. She took an English newspaper with her, six weeks after date, but I suppose that is modern here."
"Quite," returned the farmer, "my wife will enjoy it. She loves everything English."
"And you."

"I never want to see England again," was the compt reply. "Last time I was over I won my prompt reply. "Last time I was over I won my wife, and I felt then I'd got all out of the old

cliques, after our wide, free, unfettered life out here—why, it would stifle me, Mr. Blake."

Mrs. Page joined them at tea with two red spots burning in her thin cheeks. Duke marvelled at the excitement in her manner, and hoped it was not due to their recent conversation. But her husband took it phlegmatically enough.

"She's often like that," he told his guest later,
"I expect she's found a name she used to know a expect sine's found a name she used to know in that paper of yours, and it's carried her back into the past. I wish with all my heart there was a stream called Lethe to be found nowadays. I'd get her some of the water if it cost me a small fortune."

"You think forgetfulness happiness?"

me a small fortune."
"You think forgetfulness happiness?"
"I do—there's plenty to look forward to, I find, so why in the world should people continually be looking back."
"The problem is beyond me, sir."
Duke did not have another chance of a word alone with Mrs. Page that pight. He fancied

Duke did not have another chance of a word alone with Mrs. Page that night. He fancied once she was trying to secure a tite-a-tite, but he did not second her efforts. He was ready to give her the help he had promised, but—not being a woman—he saw no use in going over and over the story of the past, and he thought silence kindent; he had not spoken another ward alone to kindest; he had not spoken another word alone to his hostess when he went to bed, and certainly his last waking thoughts were not of her story, and yet he fell asleep and dreamed that a girl called May Nairn had caught hold of his hand. and was trying to lead him somewhere against his will.

"You must come with me," she pleaded in a sweet clear voice, "for Gladys wants you. She is dying, and she cannot fall asleep until she has seen you once again."

(To be continued.)

country I wanted. No offence to you, sir, I'm proud to welcome an English guest, but to go back to the old country, with its narrow views and petty water they turn on their backs and are drowned.

BRIC ROSE AND PLACED A CHAIR FOR HIS CLIENT.

HIS STRANGE CLIENT.

[A NOVELETTE.]

CHAPTER I.

He was a young man and life had been very hard on him; he had a somewhat romantic history of his own which made him admit truth was sometimes stranger than fiction; add that he had n very kind heart and pitied every woman in distress, and you have the reasons which induced Eric Milton to take up the case of Mrs. Hawthorne.

Eric Milton had been brought up by his uncle, an old-established London lawyer.

Mr. Rawson was a widower, whose only son, after a rather disreputable career, went to Australia, and was never heard of again, so that Eric was regarded by everyone as his uncle's successor and heir of the very comfortable fortune the former had got together.

Alas for human expectations; Mr. Rawson died suddenly a month after Eric was "admitted," and before any deed of partnership had been drawn up; the scapegrace son appeared, no one quite knew from where, and there being no will took possession of everything, and amounced his intention of carrying on his father's practice, with the assistance of the managing clerk, Maurice Howell.

There was no remedy; every creature in the effice knew Mr. Rawson's intentions respecting his nephew, but intentions are not deeds. The returned prodigal had duly qualified as a solicitor before he left England, and his offences against home and morality all belonged to his private, not his professional character.

Maurice Howell, who was toady enough to wor ship the rising sun, declared promptly that "Mr. Frederio" was the right person to carry on things; a man of forty had more experience than a youngster of twenty-four, and it stood to reason a son's claim was nearer than a nephew's.

Eric Milton had no redress; his cousin condescendingly offered him a clerkship at seventy pounds a year which he promptly refused; he re moved his possessions from the old house in Bedford Square where he had spent so many happy years, and settled for the present at a boarding house out Bloomsbury way, partly because the proprietress was the mother of an old schoolfellow, partly because he hated thought of London lodgings.

Eric was no coward, but he acknowledged his position looked bad enough; an expensive training had qualified him thoroughly for a profession he really loved, but he had no capital, he could not buy even a junior partnership, managing clerkships were hard to come by, and meanwhile the need was urgent, he must start some way of earning money at once.

"Set up for yourself, I'll send you all my business," said a shrewd, middle-aged merchant to him. "I'll do something more, if the initial expenses of rent, office furniture and so on is a difficulty, I'll advance you two hundred pounds,'

Eric looked at him in amazement.

"Do you mean it, Mr. Dolby?"
"Rather! Why the world can't have dealt very generously with you, young man, for you to be so surprised. I think your uncle very much to blame for not making a will, but I really think he believed his son dead, and so can excuse As for Frederic Rawson he has treated you shamefully, and after his conduct to you I couldn't trust him with any of my business.

So Eric started for himself in two very small offices near Chancery Lane, and if it was a very up-hill fight, no doubt it was a far pleasanter life for him than if he had become his cousin's

He worked early and late, he kept no assistant but a small office boy; he threw his whole soul into the cases brought to him, and certainly his were few, and their business-except Mr. Dolby's -slight.

It was all Eric could do to make both ends meet, and twelve months' after his uncle's death he looked years older than the gay, careless young fellow who had lived with Mr. Rawson in Bedford Square.

He heard of his cousin from time to time; being in the same profession and within a mile of him, he could hardly fail to do so.

Fred had taken the managing clerk, Maurice Fred had taken the managing clerk, Maurice Howell, into partnership, and the two were said to be doing very well, though Mr. Rawson attended very little to office duties himself; he lived at his father's old house, but had an entirely fresh staff of servante, and went in for more show and luxury than the old lawyer had ever induced in ever indulged in.

ever indusped in.
"But he can afford it," said Eric's informant.
"Your uncle had saved a large fortune, and he had a first-rate connection, which it will take some years for his successor to altogether lose. Mind you, Mr. Milton, I don't believe your cousin will presper in the long run, he trusts too much to that hatchet-faced partner of his; but at present he can afford to cut a dash."

And meanwhile Eric found the greatest difficulty in keeping his own head above water; and the young lady who, in old Mr. Rawson's lifetime, had promised one day to share his fortunes, calmly broke off the engagement, expressing (on a perfumed sheet of heliotrope note paper) her conviction that she was not fitted to become a poor man's wife, and she would not be a stumbling block in dear Eric's path, but remained ever, his friend and well-wisher,—ALICE SEYMOUR. Eric crushed the note in his hand, and felt, perhaps, the bitterest pang he had suffered in all his troubles; but he was a brave fellow and he soon pulled himself together.

"I may be thankful my uncle died before our marriage," he thought; "it would have been He worked early and late, he kept no assistant but a small office boy; he threw his whole soul into the cases brought to him, and certainly his clients had every cause to be satisfied; but they I am well quit of her. A girl who could just a fellow because he turned out poorer than she expected, is not worth a regret. But, how I loved her! I feel as if I could never believe in a woman's truth again.'

He went back to his boarding-house with a heavy heart. Mrs. Mason, the kindly proprietress, felt (roubled as she looked at the young man's pale, auxious face. She was a motherly soul and took a friendly interest in all the inmates; more than usual in Eric, perhaps, because he had been the close friend of her only son, the young ourste, who had been cut off at twenty-five, leaving him to earn a living as best she might,

"You look so tired, Mr. Milton," she said to You look so tired, Mr. Milton, she said to Eric after the seven o'clock dinner, when the other inmates were leaving the dining-round, and she had a chance of a word alone with her favorite, "don't you think you are working too hard!"

"Not hard enough," he answered, pleasantly; "clients are few and far between, Mrs. Masin."

She led the way into ber own little althing-room which stood at the end of the hall, a tiny canctum, but which had the rare merit of being cool on the very hottest days.

Eric took a chair by the window and heaved a sigh of relief as the sweet evening breeze came in and fanned his hot, tired face.

"You should take a holiday," went on the good lady, kindly, "this heat is knocking you up,"
"I couldn't get away, and I've nowhere to

Well, a Saturday to Monday at Chislehures, to the Fire to stay since Easter; aren't the Seycoours at home

He looked at her and never flinched

They are at home, Mrs. Mason, but I have no invitation to visit them; I never shall have again. Miss Soymour thinks she is not fitted to marry a poor man, and as she has no faith in my ever becoming anything else, she wishes our engagerneut to cease

The tears started to Mrs. Mason's eyes; in spite of the wear and tear of keeping twelve boarders she had a wonderful power of sympathy.

"The heartless guil" she exclaimed; "but there, blaming her won't mend marters. If I were in your place, Mr. Milton, I know what I should do

"Go down to Chislehurst ? It would be of no time: Alice has made up her mind this time. There have been plenty of signs that ought to have warned me of it, but I was so blind I would

"I didn't mean go down to Chielehurst at all, corrected Mrs. Mason; "I should just make up my mind to get on so well that one of these days Miss Seymour might regret what she has thrown Eric smiled half sadly.

"Haven't I tried to get on hard enough already? If I failed when I had the hope of her, am I likely to succeed now I have no aim in life to spur me on !

"You mustn't talk like that," said Mrs. Mason, cheerfully; "it's a long lane that has no turning, and when once you take a start you'll get on like a house on fire. There are plenty of girls in the world quite as pretty as Miss Seymour. You a house on fire. will not be the brave young fellow I have always thought you if you sit down and fold your hands in despair just because a heartless coquette has jilted you; that would be a pretty triumph for her. If I were you I'd not let her say she spoilt your life.

"I'm not going to give in," said Eric; "at least, not if I can help it. But we all have our 'blue' times, Mrs. Mason, and this is one of

"Well," said the lady of the house, with a eigh, "I know I have 'blue' times: when one is almost in August (a month no fresh boarders come in), and knows there are four ampty rooms, and rent and taxes going on just the same; why it makes a woman feel down."

"Didn't you get any answers to the last adver-tisements?" asked Eric, who took a friendly interest in his hostess.

"Not a single one. It's a bad time. You see the middle of July everyone is thinking of holidays at the seaside or in the country, not of seeking fresh quarters in London.

A loud knock at the front door passed almost unnoticed by Mrs. Mason and Eric. Each of the inmates possessed a latch-key; but Polgarth House was more of a home to those who lived there than a boarding house usually is. The gentlemen often asked their friends to see them. There was a very good smoking-room, well supnewspapers and armebairs, where visitors could pass an hour very pleasairly.

But the tall "boy," who was boote, butler and general factorum at Polgarth House, appeared at the door of his mistress' sanctum with a perplexed face.

"It's a lady, ma'am. She says she's come about the advertisement. The cab's piled up with luggage."

Ladies were not unknown at Polgarth House Ladies were not unknown at longares.
Husbands and fathers spending a few works there in May or June brought their wives and daughspent three months at a stretch with Mrs. Mason and her prospectine always asserted that her persons was for "ladies and gentlemen," but this was the first time in her experience that one of the gentler sex had arrived alone unexpectedly and accompanied by her lugrage.

"You had bester see the lady hers," said Eric, coming to the rescue; "the drawing-room is pretty full to night, and I'll vanish."

The stranger whom Herbert ushered into the little sanctum was another surprise to Mrs. Mason. She was so young that she would easily but for a sad, rathe have passed for nineteen, but for a sad, rather wietful expression. She was beautifully dressed in a soft grey travelling costume; a small black of for nineteen, but for a sad, rappression. She was beautifully dre bonnet rested gracefully on her golden-brown hair, and though evidently weary, and unused to business transactions, she spoke to Mrs. Mason with a gentle dignity which went to the widow's heart.

"I never was in England before," the stranger said, quietly. "I only landed at Southampton this morning. I had thought of going to an hotel; but a lady on the steamer told me I hould be more comfortable at a boarding-house She wrote down the address of two or three, and I came to you first, because I saw from an advertisement you had vacancies.'

"I have several vacancies," said Mrs. Mason, gravely; "but I almost fear my house would not sait you. Most of my boarders are City gendemen, away all day. I have very little lei-ure myself, and I fear a young lady coming alone would find it a very dult home."

"Mrs. Bucaman said you would be kind to me," said the girl, auxiously. "I should not feel quite among strangers if I came here. Won't you try me for a month, Mrs. Mason! no references, for all my friends live abroad; but I could pay in advance; and Mrs. Bucannan gave me her husband's card. Of Bucannan gave me course they know nothing of me, except that we were fellow travellers; but-I shall be very pleased for you to come and how you like us," said Mrs. Mason, kindly; and there is no need to think of paying advance. Let me show you the rooms I have vacant, If you find we are too dull and prosy for you, you can leave at the end of a week."

"I am sure you will not be that. I wanted to be right in London, not in the suburbs, because have so much to do."

She selected the smallest of the three rooms, evidently influenced by the fact that it was also the cheapest. The luggage was carried up, and Mrs. Mason offered supper in her own room if she was too tired to come down; but the girl shook

'I dined at Southampton, thank you, and shall want nothing more to-night.'

Mrs. Mason was about to leave her when a thought struck her. "Will you tell me your name, please. I always like the servants to know who is staying with me in case of letters and callers. I do not expect any letters, and I am sure I ll have no callers," said the new boarder frankly, "but my name is Barbare Hawthorne."

Arrived downstairs, Mrs. Mason gave some orders to the page spent Miss Hawthorne's comfort, but the boy calmly corrected her.

"She's Mrs. Hawthorne, ma'am, at least, that was on the labels of her luggage."

The boarding house proprietress stared.

"You must be mistaken, flerbert."

But the boy persisted. The labels had rather interested him, as he had a brother who had emigrated to Australia and was hiving at Sydney, the very port at which Mrs. Hawthorne had embarked for England.

"She must have married when she was a child," decided Mrs. Mason, "She doesn't look twenty now, and where in the world is her husband? He must be mad to let such a levely young creature go roving about the world alone."

Breakfast was a lingering weaf at Mrs. Mason's. It begue at eight when the City clerks set the example of proceedity, and was to be had at any time from the till half-pasterine, when the table was cleared. Most of the hoarders, however, were early birds, and it was sere that anyone came down later than half-past-right, so that when Mrs. Hawthorne appeared at othe o'clock she frand the hir dining-room uneccupied except she found the big dining room neoccupied except by her hostes, who, in her morning dress of black and white flowered delains, lasked a very kind motherly personage.

Barbara Hawthorne, in a white cambric trimmed rith embroiders, was quite a vision of youthful

Mrs. Mason glanced instinctively to her left hand, and had to bow to Herbert's superior wisdom, for there on the third finger was a broad gold wedding-ring. The widow felt broad gold wedding-ring strange that a man bewildered, it was so passing etrange that a man should part from so beautiful a young wife needlessly, and the shoice of the cheapest bedroom hardly suited that lovely embroidered robe, for the washing of which a London laundress would certainly charge half-a-crown.

"I hope you are rested," said Mrs. Mason kindly. "I think you told me you had never kindly. "I think you been in England before."

I am Australian born. I am per-Never. fectly rested, thank you. I am so glad to be safely in England at last."

There were black ribbons at her throat and round her waist. Mrs. Mason remembered she had worn a black bonnet the night before, and said kindly,-

"I hope you are not mourning a near relation,

Mrs. Hawthorce.
"My mother," and a tear stood in the beautiful blue-grey eyes; "she died just three months ago, and I promised her solemnly I would come to England about some family business. I was not sorry to come, I felt so terribly lonely in Australia when I had lost her."

"But your husband," exclaimed M s. Mason at the risk of being thought imp rement could he apare you

"My husband died two years ago. "But we had only been married a week, and I knew, when I married him, he was dying. I think he wanted to feel sure I was provided for. He left me all he had now Ried." He left me all he bad, poor Fred.

After this Mrs. Mason felt prepared for anything. If this child were indeed a two-years widow it seemed to the worthy landlady she should never be surprised at anything squin.

Barbara finished her breakfast, and then wandered to the window, where she stood looking out into the equare, whose dusty shrubs and drooping flowers told plainly of the unusual heat of that particular sammer.

"I suppose," and Mrs. Hawthorns locked a little anxious, "one can go out any time and walk anywhere."

Mrs. Mason felt puzaled.

"I think you will find walking in London very tiring, because the streets are generally so crowded. Did you want to go anywhere apecial?

"Yes," said Barbars, decidedly. "I want to and see a lawyer."

"But what lawyer, my dear ! There are so "I don't know. I thought I could look in a directory; but if there are so many I might get puzzled. Mother seid, 'Find an honest lawyer who has time to listen to you, she thought some of the English lawyers were so busy they would never trouble about a stranger.

I know one lawyer," said Mrs. Mason, " who would have time, and who is as honest as the day, Mr. Eric Milton. He has lived here for the last year, and I never want to meet a more arraightforward fellow. You might go and see him, and if he couldn't undertake the business himself he would be able to recommend you to someone else Where does he live !" asked Barbara. "I mean, where does he see his clients f I'll go round

BOW. His offices are at Trafalgar Chambers. can take an omnibus to Chancery-lane, and then you'll be close. But he will be home at seven if you would rather see him here."

"I would rather go to him," said Mrs. Hawthorne, gravely; "thank you very much for telling me of bim."

Mrs. Mason longed to suggest that the white embroidered cambric was not suited to the expe-dition; but she was glad she had kept silent, when Barbara came down in a soft black cashmere, which set off her dazzingly fair complexion, while a large picture lace hat, trimmed with white roses completed a coatume so attractive that Mrs. Mason decided Barbara Hawthorne, whether widow or not, was certainly a beauty.

CHAPTER II.

"A LADY to see you, sir!"

Eric looked up to find the boy clerk regarding him with open-mouthed surprise. It was the first time so fair a vision had come to the office since he had held his present post,

"A lady, Jos!" a ked Eric, who had visions of one of the tall gaunt females who visit offices from time to time with bogus subscription lists.

"Bloss you, yes sir," responded Joe, "and a real tiptopper!"
He ushered in the "real tiptopper," and closed the door.

Eric rose and placed a chair for his client, wondering much what she could possibly require at 'My name is Hawthorne," she said, simply, "and I am staying at Polgarth House. Mrs. Mason thought you might possibly assist me in some legal business which has brought me to England. I am Australian born and bred, so I understand far less of English law than your own countrywomen. My husband is dead, and I am practically alone in the world."

Eric felt strangely touched by the last words.

Barbara Hawthorne's beauty had in it something so youthful and pathetic that she seemed a creature made to be taken care of and guarded at every turn from life's rough travels. To think of her as so utterly alone, that she had crossed the ocean by herself to make her home among strangers was hard.

"I shall be happy to advise you to the very best of my power, Mrs. Hawthorne," he said earnestly. "Will you tell me the case in ques-

She blu-hed crimson. "But, first, I ought to tell you that I am not rich now. I have I think enough to keep me in England for a year, and sufficient over to take me back to Australia if I fail, and leave a hundred pounds for legal expenses; but if it should cost more than that I haven't got it."

ng ad

era

Eric smiled, he really could not help it, the confession was so naive.

"If you will tell me everything, I can give you my opinion whether you have a promising case; I don't think you need worry about the pecuniary part of it yet."

"I hardly know where to begin," said Barbara;
"I shall have to go back a long way to make it clear, and that will take up so much of your

"I can give you the whole morning," he answered with imprudent frankness, "for I have no other appointments. Tell me the story in your own way."

"My mother was a very beautiful woman," began Barbars, "and the very beet one who ever lived, but my father was a ne'er-do-well; he had done lots of things that might have landed him in prison if he had been caught; but in those days we lived in the Bush, in a very wild, lawleas place, where people did pretty much as they liked, so that he escaped; but there was one man who knew his obaracter and had some secret of his in his power; this man's name was James Walters, he was over forty, an Englishman down on his luck, and, I do believe, as big a scoundrel as ever lived.

You have not told me your father's name, said Eric, who was carefully making notes on a sheet of paper.

Robert Brown, but it won't help you." "I beg your pardon; I will not interrupt

She seemed to find it difficult to go on, and

Eric noticed her face was dyed a deep crimson, and that she steadily avoided meeting his eyes.

I was nineteen, and this Walters admired me, or said he did; any way, he wanted to marr and promised on our wedding day he would give he proofs he had of my father's crime. other was dead against the match, and I-well I hated Walters, but I seemed powerless to help myself. I had no friends near, and my father had always been a tyrant; at last I was nearly giving in when Mr. Hawthorne came. I had known him since I was a little child. He had taught me everything I knew, and though I did not love him I would have trusted him sooner than anyone in the world.

"I told him my story, and he promised to take me to Sydney where he had friends who would help me to earn my living. We did not tell my mother, we thought it would make things easier We did not tell my for her with my father, if she did not know what had become of me..... There was an accident...... I can't tell you more; but when we got to Sydney it was a dying man who was carried to the house of Mr. Hawthorne's friends.

"He knew he had not many days to live and he begged me to marry him, that, as his widow, I might inherit all he left, and so be free to live away from my father. We were married one week, day for day, before Fred died."

She spoke with strong emotion, and Eric felt s deep pity for her even while he had not a notion where her need of legal aid came in; he kept perfectly silent, and presently she went on

"I had a long illness then. I suppose it was the abook of all I had gone through from my father's persecution. When I was well enough to understand things, the Parker—they had kept me with them all the time—told me that my father had been to Sydney, but they had refused to give me up; then, acting in my name, as I was a minor, he had been to the bank and tried to draw out Fred's money, but from some wonderful chance, he could not find out where it was invested. My husband had told several people of his making ten thousand pounds; this was the sum he had mentioned to me, but no one, not even the Parkers, had an idea where it was placed; save that I was Mrs. Hawthorne instead of Barbara Brown, all was as though that strange of Barbara Brown, and wedding had never been."
"And your mother?" asked Er'o.

"I'm coming to that. After my flight, my father and Walters made up their differences; the former had come into some money, we never knew how till afterwards, and bribed Walters to hold his tongue.

"My father and mother came down to Sydne and took a house there; they seemed very well off, and after a time I went back to them. Walters had disappeared; and I think, perhaps, that was the happiest year of my life. Then my that was the happiest year of my life. Then my father died, and confessed, with his last breath, he had stolen Fred's ten thou-and pounds; he and Walters knew his writing, and together they forged an order for the amount skilfully. he was going to all the banks in Sydney and pretending to be anxious about my money, he end Walters had divided the spoil."
"It was abominable!" said Eric, hotly; "it was shameful!

"There's not much more to tell," said Bar-

"James Walters sailed for Eugland bara. directly after my father's death; and then my mother's health began to fail; and when she knew her end was near, she told me the truth. I was her child, but not the child of the man who had robbed and ill-treated me. She was a widow when she married Robert Brown, and my own father was an Englishman—Clive Adair— for marrying whom her own family had cast her off. They were rich and great, and she said she thought that, after all these years, her parents must surely have forgiven her. She had never breathed a word of them while Robert Brown lived. She said she should have died of shame had her father ever seep her second husband; but she believed, for her sake, he would receive me. She said I was the image of herself when she left her English home, and fir old sake's sake they would be good to me. She said I sake they would be good to me. She said I should find all the proofs of her story in a little writing-desk in her room, and she died before she had told me even her father's name.

Eric Milton stared. "And the papers !"

"And the papers I"
"The desk was empty. Mr. Milton, don't ask me for proofs of how I know it I can't give them you; but I am as certain James Walters stole those papers as I am that I am sitting here.

His object?" asked the lawyer, thought-"To be revenged on me. The last time I ever saw him he sawere that he would make me bitterly repent crossing his will. It was not enough that by a skilful forgery he and Robert Brown possessed themselves of the fortune my husband left me; it was not enough that for years he had been the curse of our domestic peace—James Walters was more like a fiend than a man ; and this was his revenge. He had robbed me once of my husband's fortune, he resolved to rob me a second time of what I valued more than wealth—the proofs of my descent from an honest English family. I promised my descent gring mother I would come to England, and never rest until I had found her father; and now, though the difficulties in my path are ten times greater through the loss of these papers, I mean to keep my word."

Eric looked at her with a smile of admiration for her courage.

You mustn't think," went on Mrs. Hawthorne, with a strange, dreamy smile, "that it's only money I want. I'm not so very fond of money, and I know I've enough, anyway, to take me back to Sydney, where I can earn my living easily, and where the Parkers would give me a home as long as I wanted it. It's not money so much as the longing to feel I'm not quite slone in the world quite alone in the world-the longing for someone belonging to me I can feel proud of. Almost as soon as I knew anything at all I was ashamed of my father, as I thought Robert Brown then. And, though I worshipped my dear mother, I pitied and loved rather than looked up to ber. My husband, poor fellow, I knew well enough had come out from England 'under a cloud,' and was come out from England under a cloud, and was cast off by his father. I don't mind working for my bread if my English relations don't offer me a home; but oh! I'd like just for once to feel I could hold my head up and say I belonged to folks who had nothing to be ashamed of."

She stopped abruptly; her excitement had ell-nigh broken down her strength, and she trembled like a leaf.

"I understand," said Eric, kindly; "I think I know just how you feel. And now will you try be calm, and answer me a few questions " Yes," she took out a little leather pocket book, extracted two papers from it, and placed them in his hand.

"I got these in Sydney—I know they throw no light on my mother's family, but at least they prove that I am not Robert Brown's daughter."

They were two certificates, one of the baptism of Barbara, child of Helen and Clive Adair; and the other, dated two years later, of the marriage of Helen Clive, widow, and Robert Brown, bachelor; of this last ceremony James Walters was one of the attesting witnesses, "I am glad you have these," said the young lawyer. "Don't you see, Mrs. Hawthorne, if you can find any of the Adairs, they will naturally know whom their relative married."

Barbara shook her head.

"I believe my father was an orphan without any near kindred. I thought it might be possible to advertise for the certificate of his marriage. it must have been just before mother left England, and that was in the autumn of "Meaning the Australian autumn?"

"No, the English one, for I have heard my ther say she landed only a few weeks before mother Christmas. I believe she was married immediately before sailing, but in any case it would not been long before."

Eric Milton looked thoughtful.

An advertisment addressed to parish clerks and others, for the marriage certificate of Clive Adair, supposed to have been married in the summer or early autumn of 1870, and offering a reward of five pounds. That seems our best plan.

And you think I have a case ?

He looked at her pityingly.

"My dear lady, it would be far easier if we build find James Walters, and bully or persuade could find James him into giving up those papers."

"He would never give them up without force-If I threatened to prosecute him for forging my busband's name, it might do some good, but then we have first to find him, and it seems easier to find my grandfather.

Eric Milton hesitated.

"Have you any idea if your mother was an only child?"

She had two brothers and one younger sister; there was a gap between the boys and mother, they were grown up when she was a child. mother, she was only forty when she died, and yet for years and years she had looked and seemed quite old.'

If she was forty and her oldest brother say fifty, that would bring the father to over seventy. you see what I mean, Mrs. Hawthorns ? an old gentleman would remember every circumstance of his child's disappearance, and be quick to notice an advertisement bearing her husband's name; but if he and his wife were dead, brothers and eisters would not feel the same interest.

She shook her head sadly.

"Wouldn't they ?"
"I fear not. Twenty-two years is a long time to remember a sister never seen or heard of in them. Your uncles and auuts may be married with grown-up children of their own, and have well-nigh forgotten the sister who disappeared so opg ag

Mrs. Hawthorne looked up at hise, saying,-

"Do you think it's hopeless?

"Not hopeless," he answered gently, "but I fear it is a long and difficult task. I will issue the advertisement, and I propose to see a skilful detective and give him a full and particular description of James Walters, if you can furnish it with the date he left Australia. If the man is really a queer customer, depend upon some of the police will know something of him."

rbara shook her head.

"He is bad to the very core," she said;
"he was always doing shady things, but he never got found out. He left Sydney a year ago last April. I know he sailed under his own name, and I can tell you the name of his vessel—it was the Southern Queen."

Milton carefully made notes of this, then, as

Mrs. Hawthorne rose up to go, he asked,—
"Did you say you were staying at Polgarth

House ?

Yes, I only landed in England last night and a lady I met on the steamer told me of Mrs. Mason's, so I thought I should feel less strange there than at an hotel.

Mrs. Mason is one of the kindest women in the world. I have fived with her over a year-but it is a dull house for a young lady." Barbara raised her beautiful eyes half reproachfully to his face.

I am not a young lady, Mr. Milton. I feel more like forty than twenty-one, and I don't think I could bear to be anywhere very lively so soon after mother's death. I only want a quiet place to wait in while you try and find out my grandfather, How long do you think it will Eric opened his eyes.

"I can't give you the least idea. If anything comes of the advertisement the rest would be easy. If that brings no answer the case will be far more complicated. You have no idea you see of your grandfather's social position."
"I told you he came of a good old family."
"But you do not know if he was a nobleman.

If he were I might get a peerage for the year preceding your mother's marriage, and make a note of all the nobles who had a daughter called Helen. Then searching through the succeeding years we should come on the fate of these ladies, until we found one with the entry, Married Clive Adair.' "

Barbara shook her head mournfully.

Barbara shook her head mournfully.

"He was a rich man. They had carriages and horses, and servants. I'm not sure, but I think mother was presented at Court. I know when she came out my grandmother gave her a pearl necklace, and she took it away with her, not because of its value, but because it was her mother's last present."

"Have you get it now 1"

" Have you got it now 1"

"My stepfather took good care his wife should possess no valuables. She kept the clasp for It was with the papers I told you of, and o doubt passed with them into James Walter's handa

Milton looked at her intently.

"I should say you were a good hater, Mrs. Hawthorne. How you loathe that man, why the very tone of your voice alters when you speak of him."

"I do hate him," she answered passionately; "it may seem to you vindictive, and unwomanly, but I think I would give almost anything in the world to be revenged on James Walters. ever since I can remember he was the black shadow on our home. Weak as my stepfather was, I don't think he would have been quite such a worthless creature but for Walter's influence over him. I have my mother's wrongs to avenge you see, as well as my own."

CHAPTER III.

IF Eric Milton found clients few and business rather slack, his cousin, Frederic Rawson, had, far, no cause for either complaint. As yet the practice get together by his energetic hardworking father, still flourished. Here and there fair-minded men, like Mr. Dolby, had withdrawn their custom; but the great majority seeing the old clerks still there, and everything apparently on the same footing, thought a! must be well, and adopted Maurice Howell's theory that a son was nearer than a nephew, and Eric Milton having usurped his cousin's place for a good many years, had no right to complain now. So things want well in Oak Tree Court, and money came in apace, yet the expression on the face of the senior partner was hardly a satisfied one as he entered the office suddenly one July day, seed through to the private room Maurice Howell now reigned supreme, and sank panting into a chair.

exclaimed Howell, who in "Mau alive!" respect, "what's the matter? you look as if you had seen a ghost."

Rawson's teeth were chattering, and his knees trembling, despite the summer heat, but he resented the suggestion.

" It's only fools believe in ghosts, but I've had a bit of a shock; get me some brandy, quick,

Howell watched him rather uneasily, unlocked a cupboard, took out a bottle, and pouring a small quantity of brandy into a glass, brought it to Frederic.

"That's better," said the other when he had ained it; "there's nothing like brandy for drained it: pulling a fellow together."

"It's a remedy you fly to too often," returned a other. "Now tell me what's the matter." the other.

"I'm not a fool, nor are you," was the prompt ply. "I know you were in a confounded funk when you came in here, and I don't think you'd put yourself into one for nothing, so you'd better tell me what's up. We're partners you know, so your risk is mine

You'd be welcome to the whole of the risk." said Rawson, bitterly, "There's nothing the matter, really; only I saw someone like—it couldn't have been the girl herself—someone I need to know." used to know.

"Out youder?" said Howell, moving his eyes in a direction which might have stood for any distant country, but was vague-

"Out yonder! Bless you, Howell, it can't be the. There's nothing likely to bring her to England ; but it gave me a turn, that's all."

"And if she were the lady she so closely resembles, would the consequences be unpleasant,

"Uncommonly." "Perhaps she's a legal claim on you," said Howell. "You may be shilly shallying with my daughter because you've left a ready made Mrs. Rawson the other side of the water. Plain speaking pays best in the long run-is that the

"No, it isn't," said Fred Rawson, and both his voice and manner seemed genuine. "I've never been married in my life. I don't say I never proposed to a girl, but there's not a woman in the world, this side of the equator or the other, who has a right to come forward and forbid my banns."

"That's well," said Howell, in a relieved tone; "but then, what are you waiting for ! Meg's twenty-two and you're well over forty. You're been engaged some mouths, and yet I hear withing about faving the day."

oben only about fixing the day."
"It's not my fault," said the other sullenly,
"Goodness knows I'm not anxious for a wife, and I've no taste for bread and butter misses; but since the thing has got to be done one time's as good as another to me. I shall leave Rawson to keep house in Bedford-square while I take a short trip on the continent. You won't expect me to make a very devoted husband; but-it's the lady's privilege to name the day, and Miss Margaret shall not be balked of it through any impatience of mine."

I'll talk to Meg to night," returned Maurice

Howell.

Howell.

There were plenty of people who thought "yeung" Rawson's treatment of his father's clerk generous in the extreme. Howell had been in the office over twenty years, he had been fully qualified as a solicitor for half of them, but old Mr. Rawson never hinted at making him a partner; he paid him a liberal salary as managing clerk (a very liberal one as clerkships go now), but a clerk Maurice Howell would have remained to the end of his days but for the change of head in the office.

Fred Rawson had known Howell before he left England. The staid, soberly-conducted clerk of thirty-five had not had much in common with the racketty young man ten years his junior, but he had toadied his employer's son (as was his nature) and helped to keep some of Master Fred's neglect of business from his father; and now he reaped his reward, for he was a junio partner in the firm with an undertaking i leed of partnership that his share was to be not less than six hundred a year. He had unlimited power at the office, and last, but not least, some six months after Fred Rawson returned from his long exile, he proposed to Margaret Howell, his partner's only child.

The Howells were not gentlefolks, but quiet, plodding people, very respectable, and with an intense desire to rise in life and "make a lady" of their reserve Margaret Marg of their pretty Meg. Gentility was Mrs. Howell's fetish, and her daughter, who sadly lacked the bump of reverence, said once her mother would have bored a hole in her nose and worn a ring through it, savage fashion, had she been persuaded it was a genteel thing to do!

Mrs. Howell did not particularly like her pa pective son-in-law. She never could forget the days when she had called his parents "Sir" and "ma'am," and thought it rather an honour to take tea with the housekeeper in Bedford square.

She was never at her case with Fred Rawson : but she was intensely proud of the grand match her daughter was making, and never wearied of telling Meg she was the luckiest girl in the Eighteen huudred a year, my dear, if he's a penny; and he'll settle half his property on you. Then old Mr. Rawson had the finest plate you er saw. They couldn't have grander in one of the big silver shops in the city, and Mr. Fred's a fine young man.'

"He's not particularly young," said Meg, drily. She was by no means so elated at her prospects as her mother was for her.

"He's only just turned forty, and you're twenty-two," said Mrs. Howell, " eighteen years is nothing at all; and such a generous lover, too, why I'm sure the presents he sends you are fit for a Counters

"He might keep them all for what I care," id Meg, discontentedly. "I always feel as if said Meg, discontentedly. "I always feel a they were bought with Mr. Milton's money. my mind he'd a deal more right to things than Frederic Rawson."

You're a foolish child," said Mrs. Howell,

"what's young Milton to you? I don't suppose you ever spoke to him in your life."

"Yes, I did twice. He's nothing to me, mether; but I'll tell you this. Eric Milton's a gentleman, and that's what his cousin never will be, in spite of his money.

It was not particularly propitious that this conversation should take place on the very night Maurice Howell had resolved to "speak seriously" to his wilful daughter.

The junior partner lived in a newish-looking house at East Dulwich, and returned to the bosom of his family by tramway in time for that meal so dear to the hearts of suburban Londoners, a tea dipner

Mrs. Howell's tastes were not extravagant. She had not launched out into a second servant on the strength of her husband's promotion, and still "gave an eye" to the cooking. She was in the kitchen putting a last touch to a savory stew when her husband's latch key was heard in the

Meg was alone in the front parlour, and Maurice Howell seized on the opportunity of speaking to il.

16

21

re

in:

gh

ice

hia

ster

and

ited

ome

old

"Look here, child!" he said, sharply, "Mr. Rawson's getting tired of your shilly-shallying, and he's coming down to morrow night to ask you to fix the day."
"Is he?" inqui

"Is he?" inquired Meg, indifferently. "I shan't be at home to-morrow. I'm going out to

"You must be at home," returned her father.
"I mean to stand none of your nonsense. I've worked early and late to make a lady of you, and now I've got you a rich husband, I'll not have him trifled with."

Mr. Rawson does not care two straws for me," said Meg. "I can't understand why he wants to marry me—that is if he does want to."

wants to marry me—that is it he does want and "He wants to marry you right enough," said her father, "and you can settle things to-

"Then I must go round to Linda to night, said Meg, apparently yielding, "and tell her she mustn't expect me. Mother," as Mrs. Howell and the stew came in together, both looking very hot, "I'm going round to Linda West's to tell her I can't come to tea to-morrow."

"But your supper, child," said her fond parent.

"I'm not hungry. I've a bit of a headache, and I think the air will take it off."

Linda West lived "round the corner." She and Meg had been schoolfellows, and were still friends; but it was not only Linda whom Miss Howell was anxious to see. Miss West possessed a brother, who was Fred Rawson's humble rival and Meg's favoured lover.

This fact had not lessened her friendship for Linda, as the latter was very shortly to be married herself, and so had not the least reason for wishing Algernon to remain single. The Wests were poorer than the Howells (even before the partnership) but they were also on a slightly higher social plane. Algy was a bank clerk, a very pleasant, gentlemanly young fellow, while Linda was engaged to a curate, which threw a double halo of sanctity and gentility over the little house in the Marden-road

Linda was two years older than Meg-not so pretty and rather more staid in manner; but a very nice girl for all that.

She opened the door herself, and drew her She opened the door aerself, and drew her friend into the pretty little sitting-room, which though its furniture had not cost a quarter so much as that in the Howell's "parlour," yet looked so infinitely more tasteful and homelike.

'I was just wishing you would look in, Meg, liked to send and ask you, lest Mrs. Howell should be vexed.

"I'm in awful trouble, Linda," cried Meg, clinging to the elder girl, "in pecks of trouble, dear; Mr. Rawson's coming to-morrow, and father says he means to fix the day."

She was crying now, and Linda, who had a wonderful motherly instinct for one so young, kissed and soothed her very tenderly.

"Don't fret, Meg, no one can force you to marry Mr. Rawson against your will; but why in the world did you accept him ?

"I thought perhaps he would dismiss father if I refused him, and I meant to be so disagreeable that he would be glad to break it off. And then. you know, I was vexed with Algy because he did out."

Miss West stroked the curly head caressingly. "You know perfectly Algy worships you, but was it a suitable moment to apeak out," when your father had just become ever so much richer, and had found a wealthy son-in-law

I suppose not; but "Hasn't the plan answered, Meg? have you tried being 'disagreeable' to Mr. Ravison?"

"I've only seen him half-a-dozen times since we were engaged, and he laughs at my bad temper as if it were a good joke.

And you don't like him any better ?

"I think I hate him," said Meg, with a kind of choked sob; "and, Linda, I'm certain he's a bad man. I can't explain it to you, but his eyes positively frighten me, and I couldn't marry him if I had never seen Algy, and if Frederic Rawson were as rich as Crœsus.

"Then why don't you tell him so?"

"I'm afraid to; you can't think what his eyes are like, Linda, they seem to burn one's face."

Linda changed the subject.

"Don't you want to know why I wished so much to see you to-day ?

"I believe I forgot all about it; I am ao

"Well, my news won't solve your problem, I fear, but to me it is very wonderful good fortune. Clem has really got that post, after all. He isn't a curate any longer, but the warden of St. Boniface College, Maryland, and we've got to be married at once, and sail in a month.

"Good gracious! It's seven hundred a year and a house. And you'll want a trousseau and an sutfit, and only a month to do it all in. Linda, how can you keep so quiet!"

"We've been engaged four years," replied Miss West, "and I felt Clem would be sure to get something good some day. I don't feel a bit afraid to go to the other end of the world with afraid to go to the other end of the world with him, Meg, only I don't like leaving Algy."

Miss Howell looked up with a suspicious blush.

"I think, do you know, Linda, that it's just possible I might console Algy."

"What! If Mr. Rawson is coming to-morrow to ask you to 'name the day?"

Meg looked at her friend with a strangely earnest face; she had accepted Fred Rawson half out of pique at Algy's reserve, half from parental persecutions; she had regretted that acceptance ever since.

"Don't you think, Linda, you might speak to Algy?"

"About you?" queried Linda, in a perplexed

"You might tell Algy I hated Mr. Rawson, and that I would break with him at once if I were quite sure anyone else wanted me." Linda West smiled.

someone coming up the steps. I shall get on better with my commission if I don't think you are listening to me and reproaching me if I fail.
Only, Meg," and her voice grew almost solemn, "are you quite sure of yourself? Marriage on a hundred and fifty pounds a-year means a good deal of careful managing."

"I never was extravagant," returned Meg"
"Wby, I'd marry Algy if he'd only two pounds a

The "painting room" was not a studio, for Linda West was not an artist; it was a tiny slip where such articles of furniture as looked shabby were enamelled or decorated afresh, and where the curate's betrothed retired to work at any particularly "messy" jub she had on band. There was only one chair, and nothing conducive to amusement, but Meg understood it was better for her to be out of earshot while Linda told Algy of her troubles, and the sitting rooms in Marden-road, having folding-doors, anything spoken in one was distinctly audible in the

It seemed a long time to Meg, for Linda first told her brother of her own prospects, he having left for the Bank before her lover came to aunounce

"It's ratiling good fortune for you and Clem," said Algy, with a groan; "but what on earth shall I do here by myself?"
"Marry, and bring your wife here," was the quiet reply; "the Warden's house is furnished throughout, so I shan't want my share of our Lares and Penates, and I think Mrs. Algy will fuld her home a very pretty one."

"But — there's Rawson. You say Meg won't matry him, but they are certainly engaged. I can't go and ask her to jilt him for me."

"If you were rich and he was poor it would be a risky proceeding," observed Linda, "as in that case you might always torment yourself with the fancy your money bought your wife; but as you are far away the poorer of her two suitors, I think you might venture."

And Algy took his sister's advice, with the result that Linda's little painting room became for one brief hour a scene of bliss. And this was what they settled. Algy should purchase a took his sister's advice, with the marriage license the next day, and the following Saturday he and Meg would be quietly married at their mutual parish church. Monday being the first of August was a Bank Holiday, and getting leave on Saturday, as a favour, Mr. would thus be able to spend a very short honey moon at Brighton, returning by a very early train on Tuesday, and going to business, while his bride betook herself to her new home in Marden-

You and Linda won't mind sharing domestic authority for such a short time," said Algy, smiling. "You know she is to be married on emiling. "You know she is to be married on the 22nd of August, and sails the same day for her distant home."

"I can help her buy her trousseau," said Meg, actically. "By the bye, Algy, I hope you practically. "By the bye, Algy, I hope you won't mind my not having one."
"Your not having what?" asked Algy.
"A trousseau! Father and mother are sure be so awfully put out about Mr. Rawson they

"I shouldn't mind Meg, if you came to me without any dress except the one you wore so long as I had you. But, dear, when do you mean to tell Mr. Rawson of your change of purpose ?

"Not at all."

When he comes to morrow night, I shall let when he comes to morrow night, I shall let him fix any day he pleases in August. As I am going to marry you on the 30th of July, I shall have ample excuse for not keeping my appoint-ment with him."

"And your parents !" "I will write to mother from Brighton. You see, Algy, Mr. Rawson can't do father any harm now, for the deed of partnership has really been signed for mouths.'

"I can't make out," here Algy stopped abruptly, recollecting his intended speech was hardly flattering to his flancee.

Linda West smiled.

"Well, I'll do my best, Meg; you'd better go to marry me," said Meg, guessing his thoughts upstairs to my little painting room, for I hear and speaking aloud, for she was far too candid herself to be offended at it. "Well, do you knows

Algy, it has puzzled me awfully. You see," said West, half at said West, half apologetically, "it would be easy enough to understand his wishes if he had seen more of you, but as I understand it, he proposed at your third meeting, and he hardly ever comes near East Dulwich."

"Once a month! It's not very often is it for a man whose time is entirely at his own disposal. But then you see, Algy, of one thing I am certain, Frederic Rawson does not love me.

"But then, why did he propose. The girlish face grew unusually grave.

"I can trust you, Algy, you may ridicule my fancy as impossible, but you will keep it a secret from all the world?"

-what is it, Meg !"

"From everyone—what is it, Meg !"
"I think," the girl paused more to arrange her words than from any dealt of her own opinion, "I think, Algy, old Mr. Rawson must have made a will after all, leaving everything to his nephew, Eric Milton, and that my father promised Frederic R. weon to keep the secret on condition he married me.

A dead silence, only Algy pressed the girl's hand tenderly, as though to assure her he sympathized with the pain it must have cost her to put her doubt into words.

"I have thought of it," she went on at last,
"till I am almost crazy, and I feel sure I am right. My father was with old Mr. Rawson when he died. Mr. Milton was away on his holiday, before he got back all was over, and Flederic Rawson had returned."
"You think," said Aley, gently, "your father knew of young Rawson's whereabouts all along, and as soon as the breath was out of his father's body, sent him word ?"

"Yes," breathed Meg faintly, "and I think the bargsin was struck between them there and then. A junior partnership for father, a rich husband for me, was to be the price of keeping back one simple paper."
"It would be fraud," said Algy, gravely, "Meg,

I can't believe it of your father

"Is would be fraud in the eyes of the law," the assented, ated, "but my father never liked young He always said he had stolen Mr. Fred's place in his father's heart, and to many people the son would seem to have a better right than the nephew."
"When did you think of all this, Meg 1 Not at first."

"No; it all came to me gradually. by step father gut on, first a higher salary, then the partnership, I seemed to feel it was because of what I have told you. Then, since Frederic came to our house, I can't help seeing that father does not treat him respectfully, but more as though he were—in his power."

"It's hard enough on the other fellow," said Algernon West feelingly. enough on the other man, poor

"Yes, and he is such a nice man; a gentleman to his very boots, Algy, and he was engaged to a beautiful girl. They were to have been married last Ea-ter, but father told us the other day it was all off now, for Miss Seymour couldn't bring herself to be poor.

Then Eric Milton is poor now?"

"So poor that he actually sold the best of his things when he left Bedford Square. He's living in some bearding house out Bloomsbury way. Father said he saw him the other day, and he looked ten years older.

"And your father distikes him-have you any idea why ?

"I think when Mr. Fred disappeared father hoped old Mr. Rawson would take him into partnership. He qualified for a selicitor on purpose, but the old gentleman never seemed even to think of it. He adopted his nephew, Eric, who had been left an orphan just then, and never so much as raised father's salary. I was only a child at the time, but I know how put out he was. And years later when Mr. Eric first came into the office, father seemed quire to hate him. he generally called him." young puppy

'said Algy, as he pressed a parting kiss the blushing face, "at least, I feel no on the girl's blushing face, "at least, I feel no compunction about robbing Frederic Rawson. To him you were just part of a business agreement,

Meg. While to me you are the one woman in the world.'

CHAPTER IV.

"To Parish Clerks and Others.-Wanted the ertificate of the marriage of Clive Adair and Helen—supposed to have taken place in the summer or early autumn of 1870. Ten pounds summer or early autumn of 1870. Ten pounds reward will be paid for the said certificate by Eric Milton, lawyer, of Trafalgar Buildings, Chancery La

When Barbara Hawthorne read this advertise. ment she felt as if she had really made some progress in the quest undertaken to fulfil her last promise to her mother. To the young colonist it seemed such an easy thing for every parish clerk forthwith to take up the register of marriages at his own particular church, and see if he were able to claim the reward; but Eric Milton was by no means so sauguine, and when the advertisement had appeared every day for a week and brought not a single reply he was disappointed, but not surprised.

The great difficulty in the case—as he had not told Mrs. Hawthorne—was that at every step it required money. Advertisements must be paid for on the spot; detectives and enquiry offices also require money down. While young Milton was so painfully straitened in circum-stances that to advance more than a very few pounds for any one client's business was to him a serious matter.

In some respects he thought a lawyer with ample pecuniary resonrees would have done Mrs. Hawthorne's case more justice; on the other hand, a wealthy, long-established solicitor would not have been able to bestow the personal in-terest and unlimited trouble which Eric was ready to devote to the queet.

Fortunately Barbara Hawthorne was singularly sharp-sighted. Before the advertisement had appeared often she perceived that it must cost mething, and that Mr. Milton, being a 'strug gling' lawyer, probably had not much capital. She made another journey to Trafalgar Buildings -this time with a bank-note for fifty pounds.

this time with a bank-now ro.

You know I told you I had only a hundred

You know I told you I had only a hundred pounds to spend," she said, simply. to have half the money now, be so many things to pay for—the advertise ments and the reward—and, oh, lots of things !"

Eric gave her a formal receipt for the money, observing,"I only wish, Mrs. Hawthorne, I felt sure of having to pay that reward.

"Then you have had no answer!"
"Not one."

"We shall have to fall back on the other track, and try to find James Walters."
"That reminds me. I saw the detective again this morning, and he wants to know if not furnish him with a photograph of Walters."

"Women don't keep photos of their cruellest " said the girl, simply; "and the worst of it is, his was such an ordinary face; a description of him would apply to dozens of people; but I used to be able to draw, and I will see what I can do with my pencil this afternoon; a sketch would be better than nothing."
"Better even than a photograph," agreed Eric,

"because, if done from memory, you would be sure to emphasize any trifling peculiarity."

"He had red hair, and eyes just like a fish," said Barbara, thoughtfully; "and yet those eyes could pierce one through and through. I'll do my best, Mr. Milton, and give you the sketch to night in the drawing room."

For of late the young lawyer had taken to frequent Mrs. Mason's drawing-room after dinner instead of spending the evening hours in the apartment sacred to the fumes of tobacco. Barbara Hawthorne had become a very great Barbara Hawthorne had become a very great favourite at Polgarth House. Mrs. Mason knew that she had come to England about some intricate family business, the settlement of which would decide whether she lived for the future in England or Australia; but the particulars of Barbara's quest were known only to Eric Milton. He had judged it best to take no one into their confidence, and the circle at Polgarth House were not inquisitive. Mrs. Hawthorne was a very pleasant inmate, and they hoped she would stay some time; but they did not trouble themselves particularly about her affairs, and never tried to find out more than she told them. She had been at Mrs. Mason's three weeks, and August was more than half through when she paid that second visit to Trafalgar Chambers. Several of Mrs. Mason's inmates were away for a and besides, as the only lady staying at Polgarth House, Barbara always had the drawing-room to herself in the afternoon; so she was not afraid of interruptions when she settled herself at one of the large, old-fashioned windows with a drawing pencil and a piece of cartridge

It is an open question which a woman re-members best, a loved or hated face; but it is far easier to sketch the last; in trying to reproduce the features of one dear to us, there is always the fear of not doing them justice, always (if death or absence has separated us from them) the painful sense of loss to weaken our skill.

Barbara Hawthorne had had very little instruction in drawing, but she was a born artist, and though the face she presently produced on the paper was strikingly life-like, it did not satisfy her—to her eyes it was "not half bad enough;" but any man who had ever seen James Walters could have recognised it at once, while the merest stranger would have guessed that the sketch was the likeness of someons existing in flesh and blood, not a fancy head.

Dinner was not a long function, for the people at Polgarth House were busy, and the fare, though ample, not elaborate. Long before eight o'clock Mrs. Hawthorne was back in the drawing

o clock Mrs. Hawthorne was back in the drawing room, and Mr. Milton soon followed her. "Everyone has gone out to-night," he said, cheerfully, "except the Professor, who is smoking a cigar now, but has challenged Mrs. Mason to a game of cribbage at nine."

Barbara glanced at the clock.

"He won't be here for an hour yet. Mr. Milton, here is the eketch; it doesn't satisfy me, it is not nearly so horrible as the original, but it will give you more idea what James Walters is like than any description of mine.'

Eric took the paper and carried it over to the centre table, on which stood a large Duplex lamp. He was so long in speaking that Mrs.

Hawthorne grew alarmed.
"Won't it be of any help?" she asked; "do you think it will be no use ?"

He crossed the room to her side, and she saw that he was pale as death, the veins on his forehead stood out like purple cords; he still kept the sketch in his hard as he said gravely,—

"You told me this morning Walters' was an ordinary face, you said a description of him would apply to dozens of men."

So a mere description would," she answered, " but really his face is uncommon because there is something so repulsive about it. Can't you see what I mean, a kind of look like a savage bull dog."

"Aye-you have put it into the sketch-I shouldn't think two men could have that awind expression either.

if I am sure they couldn't, but you seem up-set; I told you Walters was horrible, and this sketch isn't really bad enough."

"Mrs. Hawthorne," said the lawyer gravely, "have you ever heard my history! Our friend Mrs. Mason is fond of talking, has she ever told you of the terrible change that came to my fortunes just over a year ago?"
"Yes," said Barbara, "and I think your consin treated you shamefully."

"He had the law on his side—but what I have to tell you is passing strange; this sketch is a faithful likeness of my cousin, Frederick Raw-son; is possible that Wattern' was an assumed name, and your enemy is really my

Barbara shock her head.

He had beer known as Walters ever since I remember him, and longer too, for you know he signed that name when he witnessed my mother's second marriage."

"True, I had forgotten that, but it is a strange coincidence that my cousin arrived in England (or shall I say was seen in Eugland) after an absence of several years just twelvemonths ago, or about eight weeks after James Walters left Sydney

Barbara Hawthorne looked at him almost like a wounded child.

You are keeping something back, Mr. Milton,"

she said repreachfully; "what is it!"

"I was only wondering," he hesitated, whether my cousin could not possibly be James Walters; he might have dropped his own name on going to the Antipodes."

"But was your cousin in Australia, and when did he go out

" In seventy five ; I know he went to Sydney in the first instance; nothing was heard of him since till his father's death. My uncle never gave up the hope of his return; I have felt thankful often since that he did not live to see it; the Fred he remembered so fondly was wild extravagant, but not cruel and wicked like this Fred is now.

Barbara Hawthorne did an extraordinary thing; she dapped her hands together like a child who has made some joyful discovery, and discovery, and exclaimed,-

"I have it now. I see it all,"
"But I don't," said Eric, rather bewildered,
"but for Walters having been one of the witnesses to your mother's second marriage in seventy-three, and my cousin not having left England till two years later, I should have declared they must be one and the same. The likeness is so wonderful."

They are one and the same," said Barbara, "and James Walters has robbed you as well as

"You must let me tell you my idea in my own way. It doesn't sound possible, but I am sure I am right I don't believe the man you call your cousin is Frederic Rawson at all. I think he is my enemy, James Walters, and that he has persons'ed your cousin for the sake of what he would gain by it."

But Eric looked so utterly bewildered she had to put ir differently.

"Walters was always going about the colony. I should say he knew people in every part of it. He may have met your cousin and wormed him-self into his confidence, he may even have been with him when he died, and have agreed—for a consideration to tell his father of his end. Oh, Mr. Milton, how slow you are. Why, won't you you see what I mean? Arrived in England, and you see what I mean? Arrived in England, and finding Mr. Rawson dead, no will, and the dead Fred belt to everything, what would be easier to such a thorough villain as Walters, than to pass himself off as the exiled son ?" Eric looked at her spell bound.

"I daren't believe you are right," he said at last. "Don't you see the difference it would make to me. It would give me back all I looked on as my certain inheritance; from a struggling on as my certain inheritance; from a struggling needy man I should have comparative wealth."

"I am sure I am right," said Barbara with conviction. "Courage, Mr. Milton, Walters has wronged us both, but we will both have a reck ning with him. He shall give me my mother's papers, and restore you your uncle's property. If we are prompt it will yet be in time for your happiness. Forgive me, I ought not to speak of it, but Mrs. Mason told me you had bot love as well as wealth to your could. had lost love as well as wealth to your cousin. When Miss Seymour hears you have recovered your property, she -

She was married last week to a cotton lord," said Eric, interly. "She had been engaged to him for weeks before she finally broke with me. Don't look at me like that Mrs. Hawthorne. Don't pity me, impostor or not, my pretended cousin has done me one good turn, he has saved me from a wife who valued my honest love as nothing compared to gold." I am so sorry."

3

76

113

"You need not be. When I had her letter my eyes were opened. When I found she had married a man thirty years her senior, whom she used to make game of, my disillusionment was complete.

Barbara changed the subject abruptly.
"I suppose this man gave some proofs of his identity. He didn't just hang up his hat and am Frederic Rawson !

say, 'I am Frederic Rawson!'"

"He had plenty of proofs. Letters written by my uncle to his son before their rupture. A portrait of my dead nunt, and other personal belongings of my cousin's; but, of course, the most convincing proof of all was that my uncle's managing clerk, who had been in the office during the five years Fred served his articles there recognized him at once."

"That's bad-who is the clerk I"

"A man called Maurice Howell. Not a gentleman, but a plooding, conscientious lawyer. I would have trusted Howell with untold gold, but I never liked him. The centiment was mutual, for he could not bear me.

"Oh," and Berbara looked relieved. "Have you seen him lately?"

No.

" Heard of him?"

"Oh he's in clover. Fred has taken him into partnership and intends to marry his daughter." Do you know her !

"To you know her?"
"I have seen her once or twice—a very pleasant sort of young woman, far too good to be married to a mau old enough to be her father."
"Heaven help her if ahe marries James Walters," said Mrs. Hawthorne; "but don't you are what all this nevers."

see what all this proves i

"Why, your pretended kinsman is an impostor, and the man Howell knows it. He has 'identi-fied' Walters as Fred Rawson, on consideration of the partnership, and a rich husband for his daughter.

"Mrs. Hawthorne," said Eric, with a burst of admiration, "it's a thousand pities you are a woman, you would have made such a splendid Well, what do you suggest as our next step? I suppose we can't confront Mr. Rawson, alias Walters, till we have a few more proofs."

" I'm afraid not."

"Aren't there any old servants or close friends of your nucle who knew the real Fred?"

If there are, Maurice Howell has silenced there are, maurice riowen has sinced them. I think the best thing would be for you to try and get a surreptitious glimpso of (the supposed) Fred Rawson. Until you have actu-ally seen him and are prepared to swear he is James Walters we hardly know where we stand."

CHAPTER V.

THERE were to be nothing but surprises for Eric Milton. The very next morning he received a call from a tall aristocratic looking old man who refused to give his name, and came into the office looking so proud and contemptuous that the young lawyer did not feel much attracted to his new client.

But the stranger was not a client, as Eric soon discovered, for he had no somer seated himself than he began, irritably, --

"I've come from Cornwall, sir, to remonstrate with you on your rudeness. My lawyer wanted me to write or to let him manage the affair; but I preferred to see to it myself. I consider you ive behaved abominably."
Eric decided that his visitor was labouring under some extraordinary mistake.

"I do not understand," he said, courteously; "I do not understand," he said, courteously; and the quiet digoity of his manner impressed the irascible old gentleman. "You refused to give the inacible old gen'leman. "You refueed to give your name; but we are strangers, and I am quite innocent of any rudeness to you."

"Look at that," said the old gentleman, putting a slip of paper on the table; it was, in fact, a cutting from the Times with a copy of the advertisement Eric had inserted for Barbara Hawthorne. "Perhaps you will deny next that you are the Mr. Milron described here!"

"I deny nothing, sir," said Eric, gravely; "but I presume you have not come here to claim the reward!"

A scowl punished this speech.

"I have come here to remonstrate with you for trying to rake up a most painful family scandal," said the old man. "What is it to you whom Clive Adair married? The poor creature who was weak enough to give up home and friends for his sake did not live to repent her rashness, within a year of her unfortunate mar-riage she died."

"She died three months ago," replied Eric, very gravely, "leaving her only child a dying command to come to England, and, if possible, trace out her grandfather." I don't believe it !

"I have no interest in deceiving you, sir. Mrs. Adair's daughter landed in England at the end of July. Her one desire is to find her mother's family-not to beg of them, she is far too proud for anything of the sort ; but that-as she it, she may feel she has someone belonging to her of whom she need not be ashamed,"

The old gentleman looked at Eric as though

"And you believed this young person?"

"I believed every word the young lady spoke,
The fact that she has travelled thousands of miles to fulfil her promise to her dying mother, that she is ready to spend the whole of her

"Ab! you look as if you could keep a secret, Mr. Mitton; just put this young lady out of your bead for a moment and listen to me. My daughter, my favourite child, mind you, left my home to marry Mr. Adair. He was a gentleman, I admit, but he had nothing in the world but what he earned; he was in an Australian bank, and was home on leave when he unluckily met my girl."

"And she accompanied him on his return to Bydney ?

"Just so, and I fretted after her like the old fool I was, and when she had been gone two years I had a bad illness, and somehow i felt I could not die with my favourite girl unforgiven. I made my youngest daughter write out to Sydney (we had the name of the bank), and tell Neil and her husband were to come home. Her portion of twenty thousand pounds settled on her, would bring in more than Adair's post, and I knew I'd influence enough to get him a snug berth somewhere."

And that letter was sent ?"

"Of course it was -- I saw it myself--the reply came, not from Adair, he'd not the decency to write himself—but from the bank manager, saying Mrs. Adair died within a year of her arrival in the colony. Now my poor child has been in her grave over twenty years, and I call it abominable rudeness for you to keep advertising. for the certificate of her marriage. I can tell you the ceremony was legal enough and what is it to anyone now ? "Sir," said Etic gravely, "you have been de-ceived; Clive Adair died within a year of his return to the colony, his widow and child struggled on in abject poverty; two years later she was persuaded, for her little girl's sake to marry again; her second husband turned out a scoundrel, and, poor soul, her one object in life seems to have been to keep from him that she had rich relations in England. When he was dead she told her daughter her sad story, but death claimed her before she could give her your name and abode; she believed she left papers filling upall she had left unsaid, but these papers were atolen by a viliain who enjoyed the confidence of Mrs. Adair's second husband."

But that letter, the letter Lucy wrote to her sister—I saw it with my own eyes, "Did you see it posted?"

The old man winced.

"What do you mean?"

"Your younger daughter may have been jealous of her sister; if about to marry herself, she may have thought she would be more liberally portioned if you believed your favourite child

You mean she never sent the letter I saw ?" "You mean she never sent the letter I saw!
"Yes; she probably sent instead a formal note to the bank manager asking for Clive Adair's address; he replied by telling of his clerk's death; an 'a' skilfully added would make the letter announce Mrs. Adair's death instead of her husband's.

"Ah !"-the old man seemed half convinced-"I'll be even with Lucy. Fancy my Heien in poverty all these years that I have been longing for her. Now, Mr. Milton, where is the young either. Lucy has a good-sized family, but she

" Mrs. Hawthorne ?"

"No, Miss Adair—my graudchild you say." "But she is Mrs. Hawthorne."

"Then I'll have nothing to do with her. say Helen was poor, so of course the girl has married some dreadful and."

"I don't think Mr. Hawthorne was a cad, buthe has been dead for two years."

"A widow, eh i why she can't be twenty one."
"Just turned twenty one."

"And decent looking ! "Yes.

"Oh, hang it all I hate monosyliables, you must know what I mean; is she presentable? does she murder the English language every time she speaks? in a word, is she a vulgar little up start, or a girl who, with a little training, I need not be ashamed of ?

Mrs. Hawthorne is the leveliest woman I ever

"I didn't ask if she was plain," muttered the old man.

"And she is as graceful and refined as she is "And she is as graceful and refined as she is "The roung lawyer." "The beautiful," went on the young lawyer. "The first day she came here I thought she looked like "Oh, you did, did you? And, pray, did she give you any proof of her story?"
"Yes, the cartificate of her baptism and of her mother's second marriage. I hope I am on the track of the villain who stole the papers, when of course, the proofs would be more conclusive.

or course, the proofs would be more conclusive."
"They'll have to be conclusive, if I acknowledge her, eir," returned the old gentleman: "for my property is strictly entailed and must go to my legal heir. Both my sons are dead, and though my daughter Lucy has half-a-dozen children, if your client is the daughter of Helen and Clive Adair, she must be my heiress, even if she were half a savage."
"Will you go and see her?" asked Eric, gravely.

"I don't mind if J do. Remember, I admit nothing; for everybody's sake I must have the clearest proof; but you've convinced me of two things, sir-you're an honest man, and you really believe every word you have told me about your strange client."

Barbara Hawthorne, sitting alone in the drawing-room, writing a long letter to the eldest Miss Parker, was a little surprised when the boy, Herbert, brought her a card inscribed.

"The Earl of Lorraine."

The page was considerably impressed himself noblemen not being frequent visitors to Polgarth House; but he ushered in the august caller with great ceremony, and, closing the door, left the two alone.

It was the Earl who spoke first.

"Great Heavens! Cau the grave give up its dead ! Has my Nell come back to me !

Then Barbara took courage, she went up to him with outstretched hand. "Mother always said I was just like her. She said her father would think she had come back to him as she was when she went away." A kiss on her fair white brow seemed to say she was right.

"My dear," said the Earl, huskily, "I am quite content. From this moment you belong to me; but for the world and the family, your aunt and cousins, you know, there'll have to be legal business and all sorts of proofs. I'll stay in Loudon and come and see you every day, but I am afraid I can't take you home to Combe Lorraine till things are settled. Your aunt Lucy is the nomical mistress of my house, and—she might be unpleasant."

"I am not Nell," corrected the girl; "I am

"After your grandmother?

"Yes; and, grandfather, I don't want you to ree; and, grandrather, I don't want you to take me to live with you; I am quite ready to earn my own living, only mother had set hear on my coming to England, and I did so want to belong to somebody."

"You'll have to live with me as soon as the lawyers settle things. You'll be my heiress.' But my uncles?"

"Dead, both of them, and not a child of was my younger daughter, so your mother's child comes before the boys; it will be a bitter pill for her, but you shall have your rights, my Barbara, if there is law and justice in England. I like that young lawyer of yours, where did you pick

"He was here, and Mrs. Mason recommended me to consult him when I told her I wanted a

"He's got a head on his shoulders," admitted Lord Lorraine, grudgingly, "and he's a gentle-

"He's the truest gentleman I ever met," said Barbara. "If I had been a peeress instead of a poor colonial girl, he couldn't have given more

"He'll be no loser in the long run," said her grandfather, "I shall see to that; and now that we have made acquaintance, Barbara, I'll go back to Mr. Milton and discuss with him what steps we had better take. I'm an old man, you see, and if anything happened to me before you were proved to be my grandchild, affairs would be at a terrible dead lock."

CHAPTER VI.

MR. AND MRS. HOWELL were more than surprised—they were simply astounded—when the letter Margaret posted at London Bridge station before starting for Brighton reached them.

Married under their very eyes, so to say—for the church where the ceremony took place could be seen from their upper windows—married to a bank clerk with a hundred and fifty pounds a year, when she was engaged to a man with nearly two thousand—well, it was preposterous, abeminable!

Mrs. Howell on the whole took rather a milder view of Margaret's transgression than the husband. She was just as ambitious, just as fond of money; she had schemed and plotted quite as eagerly for the girl's advancement in life; but she had not sinned for it; so she could afford to forgive Margaret more easily than could her father, who, besides his disappointment and father, who, besides his disappointment and vexation, had to feel he had committed a crime the law calls by the ugly name of perjury, to no

Fred Rawson took his desertion very coolly.
"I was too old for your girl, and she disliked me from the first," he said, frankly. "I was quite willing to fulfil my part of our contract by mar-rying her; but she wouldn't have been happy with me. Meg was made for a quiet domestic life; she was not fit to mate with a hawk like

He positively refused a cool request from Howell for a large sum of money, saying he considered the partnership an ample reward for past services.

"I sha'n't interfere with you. I don't like law, and you'll have the whole control of the business in your hands. I sha'n't ask awkward questions about your pickings; but that must content you.'

There arose a great debate between the Howells whether they should "forgive" Margaret. Mrs. Algernon West had come to live at the little house in Mardon-road, and looked the picture of happiness. Her parents' hearts yearned towards her, but pride stood in the way of reconciliation; ided Meg must not be pardoned too easily. Linds had married her Clement and em-barked for her distant home before the Howells had decided to take Meg back again to favour; and then a very strange thing happened, which speedily solved all their doubts. One September evening, after Maurice Howell had returned from the office, a carriage stopped at his door; a lady and gentleman alighted from it, and the awestruck little maid-of-all-work told her master that Lord Lorraine wished to see him on important business.
"Gracious!" ejaculated Mrs. Howell. "A real live nobleman coming here at last! Why, who'd have thought it ?"

The Earl west to the point at once. This visit was the outcome of a long and anxious consultation between himself and Eric Milton.

Both were agreed that, without the papers stolen by James Walters, it would be a task of untold difficulty to prove Barbara's claim to be the Earl's Barbara had obtained a glimpse of Fred heiress. Barbara had obtained a glimpse of fred Rawson, and was ready to swear to his identity with the James Walters she had known in Sydney; but it seemed, both to the young lawyer and the old nobleman, their case would be far atronger if they could bring Maurice Howell over to their side. If, when they accused the so-called Frederic Rawson of fraud and theft, his partner joined in condemning him; if the one person who had identified the colonist as old Mr. Rawson's exiled son confessed he had been mistaken, the game was in their own hands.

"I dareasy you are surprised at my calling so late," said Lord Lorraine; "but my business is entirely of a private nature, and could not be ted at your office. I have come to warn you, Mr. Howell, that you are the victim of a very clever conspiracy, and have been deceived by as artful a villain as ever wore shoe-leather. The man who pretends to be Frederic Rawson is an Australian blackleg, and badly wanted now in Sydney on a charge of forgery and fraud. Knowing the many years you were with the late Mr. Rawson, I thought it only fair to warn you of the character of the man you have received as his son.

Maurice Howell felt certain that, as he put it, all was up; but he made a brave front, not having the least desire to share his confederate's punishment,

"Mr. Rawson brought proofs which would have convinced anyone," he protested; "as to resemblance, there's not much between a youngresemblance, there's not much between a young-ster of twenty-four and a man of middle age; he's the same height as Fred Rawson, he's got the very same manner of speech."

Lord Lorraine looked for the first time at Barbara.

"My grandchild is prepared to identify your partner as James Walters, a man who forged her late husband's name for ten thousand pounds, and who left Sydney on the Southern Queen in the April of last year; the captain and some of the passengers can be produced to swear that Frederic Rawson' is the man they knew as James Walters. Altogether, the case against him James Waiters. Altogether, the case against this is pretty black, it will probably mean penal servitude. Of course, as a lawyer you know that if you persist in supporting this impostor, you are liable to be arrested as his confederate."

Maurice Howell wiped the perspiration from his face; this was plain speaking with a vengeance. "I believed in him," he said eagerly, "I

"I believed in him, he said eagerly, I thoroughly beleived in him; why I allowed him to be engaged to my only child."
"Heaven help her," said Mrs. Hawthorne, feelingly, "for a crueller fiend never existed in human form." "Meg didn't fancy him," confessed Mr. owell, "she ran off and married someone else; Howell. very undutiful conduct, but if you are right in your suspicions, my lord, I may be glad she did

80 "I am quite right," said Lord Lorraine, gravely; "until the last few days I confess I was puzzled to know kow Walters obtained the information to enable him to get up such a fraud; but mation to enable him to get up such a fraud; but unless I am greatly mistaken my grandchild's husband, the man he so cruelly wronged, was the real Fred Rawson, and in stealing the papers relating to his property Walters also possessed himself of such others as would prove the identity of their possessor with Fred Rawson."

Exercise section of colour had forsaken Hawail's

Every veetige of colour had forsaken Howell's face, he felt the game was up indeed.

"Mr. Fred went to the colony in '75," he answered awkwardly; "he'd be a good bit older than that young lady."

"He was forty when he died two years ago," interposed Barbara. "I only knew him as Frederic Hawthorne. I knew his father was an Erederic Hawthorne. I knew his father was an Erederic Hawthorne. English lawyer, and that he left his native land under a cloud."

"Frederick Hawthorne Rawson," said the lawyer, "that was his full name; we did hear he got in clover a bit in Sydney and made a tidy fortune; but he was penniless when he came hack to England last war." back to England last year.

"Barbara," said Lord Lorraine quietly, "you had better leave us; if you will go back to the carriage I can finish my conversation with Mr. Howell in a few minutes."

When she was gone his manner changed, it grew very peremptory, "You allowed Walters to steal the dead Rawson's name and position because you wanted to make money and owed Eric Milton a grudge. Now I give you your choice, stand side by side with your accomplice in a felon's dock where he will assuredly nau numsen, or dence; you need not incriminate yourself, it can be supposed you honestly believed in his analysis apply and apply and apply a will assuredly find himself, or turn Queen's evi-identity with your employer's son."

Howel looked hopelessly at the Earl.
"It will mean ruin; Mr. Milton will never keep me on at the office."
"Well, my man, penal servitude will be rather worse than losing your situation, won't it? Come, I can't wait; you must make your choice now, which are you on—our side or Walters'?"

"On yours.

od! Then you will hold your tongue con-" Go cerning this visit. I shall call formally at the office to-morrow with a warrant for the apprehension of Rawson, alias James Walters, and you may please remember that if you attempt to defend him, you will be arrested as his confederate. What is his private address ?"

Caroline-street, Pimlico-lodgings."

"And where does he keep his papers, private ones, relating to his past ?"

"Nowhere. If he has such things he carries them on his person. I've never seen him yet without a thick pocket-book fastened by a pad-

"My dear," said Maurice Howell, when the Earl had departed, "I think you had better go and see Meg to morrow. Tell her she and West will be welcomed here whenever they like to come. I don't know that she's been so very foolish after all."

The Earl was as good as his word. The detective already engaged in the case had no difficulty in procuring a warrant for the arrest of Frederic Rawson, alias James Walters, on a charge of fraud.

The Earl, accompanied by the detective and an officer in plain clothes, called at the office, and Lord Lorraine formally tendered the charge, namely, that Walters had falsely represented himself to be Fred Hawthorne Rawson, deceased and had stolen and appropriated the property and effects of the late Walter Rawson, the said Frederick's father.

It's all a plant," said the accused lightly. "Why, here's my father's clerk, who knew me boy and man for twelve years, ready to swear to my identity.'

"Speak for yourself," said Maurice Howell, virtuously. "I can't help it if you've deceived me as well as other people. You can't be Fred Rawson, for his wife's in England, and ready to swear that her husband died in Australia two years ago.

"His wife | What, Barbara Hawthorne !" "Mrs. Frederic Rawson," corrected the Earl, my grandchild, and sole heiress. I'll trouble you, please Mr. Walters, for the papers you stole from my daughter Helen, papers she had treasured through years of suffering for her child's

Walters gave up the fight.

re

er

od

he

"I did not steal them," he persisted; "when I took them I believed Barbara would shortly be my wife, and I thought I could take better care of them than she could. I knew your sons were dead, and that the penniless daughter of a gambler's broken-down wife must, if she survived her mother, be your heiress. I meant to share Combe Lorraine with Barbara, as king consort, but never to steal it from her.

You'll find the law takes a different view of such offences," said Lord Lorraine. "Unless you want two indictments against you instead of one you had better hand over those papers."

Won't you strike a single blow in my defence," at Walters of his junior partner. "I have asked Walters of his junior partner. "I have done enough for you, why do you forsake me "If it comes to that," said Howell, bitterly, "why, I've an account of my own against you. You'll end your days in a convict's prison. You tried your best to make my child a convict's

CHAPTER VIL

"TEN years penal servitude !"

That was the verdict against James Walters, alias Fred Rawson; and when he heard it Maurice Howell felt thankful he had heeded Lord Lorraine's warning, and not taken his partner's cause.

On the whole things prospered far better with Howell than he deserved. As he expected Eric Milton declined to retain him in his office; but he settled on him an annuity of three hundred year in consideration of his faithful services his deceased uncle.

Eric was a rich man now. Walters' extrava gance had not made a very great hole in old Mr. Rawson's fortune, any more than his neglect had been able to permanently injure the business. A few months of great care, and things would be as flourishing as ever. All would be with Eric it had been up to the time of his uncle's death, save that Alice Seymour was another man's

But Eric Milton wasted no regrets upon false love of other days. His regard for her had died a sudden death the day he read her heartless letter of dismissal. He had never once regretted her since,

Eric still remained an inmate of Polgarth House, though Mrs. Mason told him, in his position he ought to set up an establishment of his own. He had let his uncle's house in Bedford Square at a long lease, and showed no hurry in choosing another; in fact, Mrs. Mason thought he seemed very little elated at his wonderful good fortune. He had seemed happier and more cheerful, she thought, before all he lost was restored to him.

The Earl of Lorraine, who had taken Barbara to his country seat (as soon as she was legally acknowledged to be his heiress), much to the discomfiture of her aunt Lucy, had his own suspicions as to the cause of young Milton's depression; and, finding all invitations to Combe Lorraine were decidedly, almost curtly, refused, he ran up to London just before Christmas, and simply insisted that Eric should spend that festival with him and Barbara.

"We owe everything to you," said the old nobleman; "but for you we should never have found each other. Bab can't make out how she has offended you that you scorn all her invitations. "I don't scorn them, Lord Lorraine, but-it is not wise to run into danger."

"Oh, come; my poor old place is not so full of peril as all that."

"You don't understand."

"I understand perfectly. If Bab had been the poor, friendless little girl she seemed, you une poor, triendless little girl she seemed, you would have asked her to marry you as soon as you came into your own again. Because she happens to be my grandchild you mean to break her heart."

"She does not know-she can't suspect." "I can't tell what she suspects; but I know she deem't look half so happy as she did when she lived at Polgarth House, I've had enough of match-making, Milton: it cost me my favourite child. Bab will be free to please herself. If she fancies you, and you fancy her, I don't see why you need go on avoiding us as if we were the

She is something more than your grandchild,

Lord Lorraine."

"Oh, you mean she's my heiress. Well, I hope to live another twenty years; so she won't benefit by that at present; and, as every acre of beneat by that at present; and, as every acre of land and every penny of money is entailed, you need not think of my property as anything but a provision for your eldest son. I liked you the first day I ever saw you; but I've had uncommonly hard thoughts of you lately, for it seemed to me you were bent on breaking my child's heart."

"You mean—don't play with me, Lord

Lorraine—it cuts too deep — You mean you would really give me Barbara?"

If Barbara wished to be given-yes. And the Earl went home to Combe Lorraine with the assurance to Barbara "that Mr. Milton would certainly be their guest for Christmas.

Mr. and Mrs. Algernon West never knew how nearly Meg's father had been implicated in the disgrace of James Waiters; but they rejoiced warmly at the latter's discomfiture, and thought Mr. Milton's allowance a very liberal one. Maurice Howell did not seek another situation. He gave up the law, and took a very pretry cottage in a rural part of Hertfordshire, chiefly remarkable for being five miles from any town and six from a station. There were three acres of ground attached, and he went in for a cow, poultry, and early strawberries. Among these innocent de-lights he was probably happier than he had ever been before; but his wife found it a wee bit lonesome. She pined for the sound of the street cries, the whiatle of the railway engines, and the mulin man's bell. At King's Walden you heard nothing and saw no one. The population was nothing and saw no one. The population was supposed to be a thousand, but it was possible to walk for three miles without meeting one of Mrs. Howell found it dreary in spite of blue sky and green fields; but she was a sensible woman, and not given to discontent; so no doubt in time she would grow reconciled to her rural home, and cease to eigh for the suburban delights of East Dulwich.

Mrs. Mason lost her favourite boarder in the spring. Eric Milton took a charming house at Kensington, furnished it with simple taste, and installed himself there early in April. weeks later, on a Thursday in June, the bells of Combe Lorraine church chimed gaily for the wedding of the Earl's heiress. Orange blossoms and bridal veil were denied to Barbara on account of her widowhood. But as Eric walked down the aisle with his wife upon his arm, he thought all England could not have produced a lovelier

HIS STRANGE CLIENT.

[THE END.]

THE Japanese camphor-tree is a monster evergreen of exceedingly symmetrical proportions and somewhat like a lime-tree. It has a red berry and its blossom is a white flower. Some of the trees are more than forty feet in circumference, and at least three hundred years old. Very little care was formerly bestowed upon the cultivation of these valuable trees, but all this has now been altered, and the result is that instead of having to wait until the tree is seventy or eighty years old before the camphor can be or eighty years old before the campnor can be extracted, an equally good yield will be e obtained in one-third of that time. The roots contain a much larger proportion of camphor than the trees; if the producers get ten pounds of crude camphor out of two hundred pounds of wood-third the camphor is the camphor than the camphor t chips, they regard it as a satisfactory yield.

THE rattlesnake has a pilot. The purpose of this pilot has never been satisfactorily explained, but it undoubtedly serves to protect him It is well known that the rattlesnake is a aluggish reptile, slow of movement and shortsighted. He can strike only to the distance of bis own length, and is not of the constrictor species, fighting with his faugs. He is not, therefore, a dangerous adversary, and can be easily whipped by a black snake or any of the constrictor family. Even a dog can get the mastery over a rattlesuake without much danger of being injured. The pilot appears like a rattlesnake, except that he has no rattles and is somewhat darker in colour. He is also of much quicker movement, and when other reptiles or animals appear that possibly might prove dangerous to the rattler, the pilot, which is not so near-sighted as the rattlesnake, conducts the latter to a place of safety. Singularly, the pilet has received but scant attention except among the native people of the section where it is found, and but little is known about him. The only species of rattlesnake having the pilot for a guide is that found in the mountains; the prairie rattler has to look pe th

th

lau

fur

SVE

cro

thr

sple

mir

you

thei

occa

her

" gr

pink

blus it ha

pret

The

bord

ostri

with drape

TH

Melic

enulr

branc

round

(which and s

blosso low b

simila while

Wreat

FACETIA.

POET: "What rhymes with 'altar'"? His wife (savagely): "Halter!"

Old Bachelon: "Do you expeat to marry, or do you prefer to keep your liberty, Miss Stronge?" Miss Stronge: "I intend to do hoth."

HOVE GRE: "Under the circumstances, what would you do if you were in my shoes?" Brighton Girl: "I am afraid I should lose myself."

Manna: "Why don't you marry Mr. Bilson ! He's a man in ten thousand." Mabel: "Oh, yes; but I'm looking for ten thousand in the man."

GAME DEALER: "Sorry we're quite sold out of game. Try some of our famous sausages?" Syortsman: "Oh, hang it all, man, I can't shoot sausages."

CLara: "What are you reading now!"
Dora: "Historical novels." "Do you like them." 'Yes, indeed. There is so much I can skip."

ETREL: "Yes, I'll accept him if he proposes. But don't tell him, Mand," "Of course not. I don't want to put a stumbling-block in the way of his proposing"

Acron: "When I am acting I forget everything about me; I see nothing but my role; the public disappears entirely." Friend: "I don't wonder at that."

"SCRIBBLEM the author, has committed suicide." "Why t" "He fell in love with the heroine of his last movel, and killed himself because she married the hero."

"Is the mistress of the house in ?" inquired the pediar. "No," replied the tired-looking, timid woman who had gone to the kitchen door to answer the knock. "It's her afternoon out."

EXTRACT from a bride's letter of thanks:
"Your beautiful clock was received, and is now in the drawing-room on the mantelpiece, where we hope to see you often."

BIONES: "I say, doctor, what's this swelling at the back of my neck!" Doctor: "Oh, it's nothing serious, but I should advise you to keep your even on it."

"Your proposal is really so unexpected, Mr. Sixtyfive, that—that you must give me time." Elderly Lover: "Time, Miss Rebecca? Do you think there is any to spare?"

AT THE MUSICALE.—First Lady Friend: "Oh, my dear, I had so much to say to you, and the pianist has finished." Second Lady Friend: "I'm dying to hear it. Let's encore him."

"I surroum Count Bogus has been accustomed to having everything of the best about him?" Of course, dear; you see he was head waiter in one of the leading hotels for yea.s."

one of the leading hotels for years."

Mrs. Dick: "How do you like your new servant?" Mrs. Tom: "I don't like her at all. She won't do." Mrs. Dick: "Won't do?" Mrs. Tom: "No; she wont do anything."

SWELLINGTON (at the soirce): "I wonder if that plain woman over there is really trying to firt with me?" Cooler (politely): "I can easily flud out, sir, by asking. She's my wife."

"I SAT," remarked the first gentleman of the long-dingered profession to his friend, as he admired the other's timekeeper, "what price did you pay for that watch!" "Six months"

When he visited the cemetery, Mike Donovan noticed on a tombstone the following inscription: "Sacred to the memory of a lawyer and an honest man." "By the powers," said Mike "that's a strange custom to bury two men in one grave!"

KATHIEEN (the servant): "Yez gev me this bottle of—phat's the nem av it!—jockey club, this mar-raio, ma'am." Her mistress: "I did. Don't you like it!" Kathleen: "I do not, ma'am. I tuk about a wineglassful av it wid sugar an' hot wather, an' it's lift a taste in me mouth wud shpoil ogge!"

TRAMF (piteously): "Please help a poor cripple!" Kind old geatleman (handing him some money): "Bless me! In what way are you crippled, my poor fellow!" Tramp (pocketing the money): "Financially, sir."

Young Huseand: "What a peculiar flavour this stewed steak has." Young Wife (diffidently): "I really cannot account for it. Indeed, in order to take away the bad taste of the onions, I scalded them myself in Eau de Cologne."

MR. NEWFOF: "Kostique called at my house last night. He said our new baby looked just like me." Absent-minded Friend: "That's Kostique all over. He's always making unkind remarks."

"JACK has finished my portrait." "At last! I didn't think he ever would." "Oh, yes! He's been at work on it only a year." "Dear me! Isn't that a long time!" "We didn't think so. We're engaged now."

MRS. DE FASHION: "How do you like my new hat!" Mr. De Fashion: "Pretty well; but there's one thing lacking." Mrs. De Fashion: "What is that, pray?" Mr. De Fashion: "The money to pay for it."

"Those birds flying over yonder are squatic birds, I suppose?" asked the young man in a seal-brown suit of the captain of the steamer. "No, they ain't," was the scornful reply. "Them is ducka."

Par has offered his school fellow a bite from his apple, and is astonished at the large piece measured off by Mike's teeth. "Here, I say; held on there, hold on!" Then correcting himseif: "When I say 'hold on,' I mean let go!"

SHE: "That was a lovely engagement-ring you gave me last night, dear; but what do those initials, E. C., mean on the inside?" He: "Why—er—that is—don't you know that's the new way of stamping eighteen canat?"

FANNY: "You take Dick Foster too seriously. Nothing he says is worth a moment's consideration." Nanny: "But he insinuated that I was one of the mushroom aristocracy." "Humph! He basn't sense enough to tell a mushroom from a toad stool."

A very interesting planist, when sitting next to Colonel Ramollot at the dinner-table, asked bing, in a winning tone of voice, "Are you fond of music, colonel?" "Madam," replied the warrior, rolling a savage pair of eyes, "I am not afraid of it."

"Don'r you think, love," said a newly-married man to his wife, "if I were to smoke it would spoil the curtains?" "Ah, you are really the most unselfish and thoughtful husband to be found anywhere. Certainly it would." "Well, then, take the curtains down."

PROPESSOE B. said: "When I married, I married the youngest of eleven children. I hadn't been married as hour before I found that in order to get along with any sort of tranquillity, harmony, or peace, one of us would have to give in. I hadn't been married two hours before I found it was I."

MRS GRUMPES: "I s'pose you'll fix your will so that I won't get a penny if I marry again. You're just mean enough." Mr. Grumppa: "No, my dear. I have merely inseried a wish that if you marry again it shall be to Mr. John Jimson. He and I were boys together. He licked me

MRS. HYFLYE: "George, dear, while you are having money troubles I ought to tell you that I learned to-day why your rival Scapem's credit has suddenly become so good." Mr. Hyflye: "Why?" Mrs. Hyflye: "I overheard someone remark that Scapem's finances must be all right, because his wife was wearing such elegant new hate and dresces."

A LITTLE girl who made too much noise in the early morning in her sick mother's room, was put out into the hall, and soon after a miserable rag doll, of which she was very fond, was tosed out to her. This was the last atraw. Snatching up her beloved, and hugging it tightly in her arms, with streaming eyes she aobbed out to her grandmother, "I wouldn't a' 'tared, but what had Judy done?'

"YES," said Gussie, indignantly; "I can candidly say that no woman evan thanked me for giving her a seat in an omnibus." "But," said the young woman, "did you ever offer a seat to a lady in an omnibus!" And Gussie mused, and murmured that that phase of the question had not occurred to him.

Young humorist (to the editor): "Have you looked over the comic sketches I left with you?" Editor: "I have." Y. H.: "They ain't as good as I might do if I hadn't so many other irons in the fire." Editor (nanding back the manuscript): "Here they are, and I advise you—" Y. H.: "What?" Editor: "Put them with the other irons."

Boney was spending the afterneon at his anni's, and for some moments had been gazing out of the window in a painfully thoughtful sort of way. "What makes you so sorious, Bobby?" asked his aunt. "Why, ma told me that I must remember not to ask for anything to eat, and I'm trying to remember it."

Mas. Subbods: "Henry, you have kept us waiting dinner a long time. What detained you?" Mr. Subbubs: "Business. Couldn't get away any somer. Looks like snow, doean't it?" "Yes. What was the nature of the business?" "Public ma'ters that wouldn't interest you. The beef looks nice, doean't it?" "Yes, the beef is all right. What were the public matters?" "Tremendous crowd in front of a tall office building. I got right in the thick of it and couldn't get away. You had a headache when I left for town this morning. Is it better?" "Yes, the headache is all gone. What—"" "Yes, the headache is all gone. What—" "How about the people next door? Have they left for the country yet?" "Yes. Trey left about twelve. What was the crowd doing?" "Why—why—why, it was—it was watching some men raise a safe to a sixth-story window. You're very inquisitive, dear."

"How will you have your hair cut, sir?" said the talkative hairdresser to the man in the chair. "Minus conversational proluxity," replied the patient. "How's that, sir?" "With abbreviated or totally eliminated narrations." "I—er—don't quite catch your meaning, sir." "With quiescent mandibulars." "Which?" "With quiescent mandibulars." "Sir?" "Let diminurive collequy be conspicuous by its absence." The bairdresser scratched his head thoughtfully for a second, and then went over to the proprietor of the shop, with the whispered remark: "I don't know whether that gentleman in my chair is mad or a foreigner, but I can't find out what he wants." The proprietor went to the waiting customer, and said, politely: "My man doesn't seem to understand you, sir. How would you like your hair cut?" "In silence." The proprietor gave a withering look at his journey man, while the latter began work, and felt so utterly crushed that he never even asked his patient if he'd buy a bottle of hair restorer.

When he went home the other evening he laid his overcoat down in the hall, and there his wife found it, and availing herself of her privileges, she went through the pockets and came out with a small box. She gazed as it a minute and went after him. "Here," she exclaimed, "what does this mean?" "My dear—"he began. "Don't 'my dear' me," she raved; "what I want to know is what you are carrying this box marked 'Ribbon for the typewriter' for?" He began to explain again. "Don't talk to me," she screamed; "I know all. You've got this geegaw for that heavey of a typewriter in your office, and will no doubt give it to her to wear at some of her society affairs and you'll probably be trying to slip out some evening to see her there; but you shan't do it, for I'll go down in the morning and settle her once for all, so I will," and she began to sob. He took it out of her hands and opened it. "Look at it, my dear," he said with a tender smile. She made a wild grab for it, and as the inky string left its imprint on her face and hands she collapsed and forgare him.

SOCIETY.

THE Queen of Greece is president of a sisterhood devoted to the reformation of criminals, and she personally visits prisoners.

THE Queen is according to present arrangements, to visit Aldershot on the 28th of this month, and ber Majeary will then inspect the Division under the Duke of Connaught's comrand

THE Princess of Wales will be about socially to a considerable extent during the season, and will most likely attend the State balls, but it is believed that H.R. H. will not dance or be present at private dances.

NEARLY all the induarchs of Europe have their lives insured. The most notable exception is the Russian Emperor. The companies would not insure him, regarding his chances of long life extremely hazardous.

The young Queen of Holland is taught to spare no pains in popularising herself with the people, and it need therefore scarcely be added that a portrait of her in the assional coatmic which was taken recently is having a great vogue amongst her loyal subjects, to whom the girl queen is an object of quite chivalrous affection.

THERE was despatched to Coburg by order of the Queen, some sprigs of myrtle from a large plant in the grounds at Oeborne, for the bridal bouquet of the Princess Victoria Melita. This plant has grown from a piece of myrtle which was in the bouquet of the Empress Frederick on the day of her marriage. It has been a rule in the Royal family that each bride is to have a piece of it on her wedding day. The sprigs were placed in the centre of a bouquet of white flowers which the Princess carried during the ceremony and at the subsequent luncheon and reception.

The Queen and the German Emperor can both laugh heartily on occasions; but more at simple fun than ill-natured satire. Both are quick at sympathising with folk in trouble; and though Royal and Imperial messages of condolence may sometimes appear atrangely worded, with the crowned sender's own importance a little too much en évidence, yet genuine kindliness shows through all, and is unmistakably appreciated. A frightful accident shocks nobody more than our Queen and the German Emperor.

The Duchess of Saxe-Coburg were a befittingly splendid costume. It is a cyclamen-coloured miroir velvet deliciously embroidered. Her two youngest daughters were not bridesmaids, but their get up was very elegant, as became the occasion, nevertheless; Princess Alexandra is in her sixteenth year now, so her toilet was more "grown-up" than that of little Princess Beatrice. Her Royal Highness wore a robe of jak Valkyrie brocade in small floral stripes, blush alternating with pink of a deeper tone; it had a low bodice and puffed sleeves arranged in a pretry girlish fashion with pink and white chiffon. Then there was a little olive-coloured cape of sarcier velvet to be worn as a wrap, with a deicate tone of pink shot with the grey, and a bordering of lace-work in a point d'Alengon ritch; the cape had a high collar with grey estrich feathers round the throat and a lining of plush pink satin. Princess Beatrice had her little cape for the shoulders too; it and the dress were all en suite, a cream-coloured bengaline, with low bodice and short sleeves, caught and draped with a sash to match, the puffs of the sleeves and the short skirt being trimmed with lace.

The nuptial costume of Princess Victoria Melics was of a thick, rich, conded silk, with pearl embroidery in large medallions, with sprays branching outward on the front of the skirt and round the hem. Above this line of embroidery (which is in a pattern of sprays of orange-blossom and true lovers' knots) was a trail of orange-blossoms. The pearl embroidery appears on the low bodies also, and there is a frilled collar of net similarly worked, and epaulettes of it to match, while not frille, with pearl edging finish the eleves. A veil of rare old point lace and a wreath of orange-blossoms completed the toilette.

b

STATISTICS.

THE theatres of London will seat 60,000 people.

The Spanish army includes altogether 26,400 officers or one officer to every eight soldiers.

In the Crimean war 1855, 309,400 men went to the front, of whom 8,490 were killed to battle, 39,870 were wounded, of whom 11,750 died in the hospital, 75,375 died of diseases contracted during the campaign. The total deaths were 95,615. The war cost £305,000,000.

RETURNS just made to Parliament of accidents to railway employés in Great Britain show that the percentage in proportion to the number of persons employed steadily decreased, with one slight exception, from the year 1873 to 1888; but there was an increase again during 1889, 1890, and 1891, and again a decrease in 1892.

GEMS.

A Man's conduct is an unepoken sermon.

THE honest poor are no scarcer than the honest rich.

Our greatest glory consists not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.

ADVERSITY is the trial of principle. Without it a man hardly knows whether he is honest or not.

The gifted man is he who sees the essential point. Intellect altogether expresses itself in this power of discerning; and how much of morality is in the kind of insight we get of anything!

HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.

PLAIN CAKE—One egg, one-third cup of butter, one cup of milk, one cup of sugar, two teaspoonful of cream of tartar in two and onehalf cups of flour, teaspoonful of soda dissolved in the milk. Bake about half an hour.

POTATORS FRIED WHOLE.—Take small, cold boiled potatose, dip them in beaten egg, and roll in fine bread crumbs; repeat the operation, and fry a golden brown in boiling lard. This makes a nice dish for breakfast or luncheon.

Hard Gingerbread.—One cupful of sugar, one of butter, one third of a cupful of melasses, half a cupful of sour milk or cream, one teaspoonful of saleratus, one tablespoonful of ginger, flour chough to roll. Roll thin, cut in oblong pieces, and bake quickly. Care must be taken that too much flour is not mixed in with the dough. All kinds of takes that are rolled should have no more flour than is absolutely necessary to work there.

Parkins.—Quarter pound flour, quarter pound oatmeal, quarter pound treacle, one teaspoonful ginger, one ounce lard, one ounce sugar, half teaspoonful of carbonate of sods. Melt the treacle and the lard together; mix all the dry ingredients together, and stir in the melted treacle and lard; mix with a spoon, it will then be all moistened. Take up a little bit of the mixture, roll it into a ball and flatten it, put it on a greased oven shelf; put the half of an almond in the middle of it; repeat till all are done, and put in the oven to bake for about ten minutes.

German Biscurrs.—Half pound flour, quarter pound buttor, quarrer pound fine sugar, half teaspoon cinnamou, one egg, and mix the flour, butter, sugar and cinnamon well together then make all into a fine paste with the egg, roll out quite thinly, and cut with a round cutter, bake, and when cool spread with jam and stick two together, then ice over. Half a pound of icing sugar, two tablespoonful of water, a few drops of lemon juice, just heat this over the fire, and pour over the biscuits very neatly. You should have just enough water barely to wet the surar.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Queen has not worn her crown more than twenty times during her whole reign.

BAYONETS were invented by a Basque regiment during a battle near Bayone. Their amountion had given out, and in despair they fixed their knives on the end of their guns to resist a charge.

RUSSIA has few stranded actors. When a manager takes a troupe on tour, he is required to deposit a sum of money with the Government to pay the travelling expenses home for the members in case they become stranded.

The blue uniforms of the Austrian army are to be abolished, and a sober grey substituted. This is the decision of a committee of experts appointed to investigate and settle the question of the best culour for soldiers' clothes.

M. Durosse, a French savant, declares that fishes can talk. They can, he asserts, produce certain sounds at will by the vibration of certain specially designed nuscless. These vibrations are caused by a little air bladder, which is alternately distended and exhausted.

Amono the novelties in electric lighting is a reporter's peucil with an electric light at the tip. This little device is convenient, in that it gives sufficient light to enable the owner to take notes at any time or place without need of lamp or candle.

PUTTING the cart before the horse is no longer a mere conception. In France it is now an accomplished fact. An inventor has got up a street-car or omnibus not drawn but driven with gearing from a treadmill attached to the rear of the vehicle and supported on wheels. The horse, therefore, rides while he works.

The pearl oyster is not in any way like the oysters which we cat. It is of an entirely different species, and as a matter of fact the shells of the so-called pearl oyster are of far more value to those engaged in "pearl fishing" than the pearls. There are extensive pearl fisheries in the Gulf of Galifornia, and some of the finest pearls have been taken from these waters.

Hor milk is a recognised drink in some of the German cafes. It is served in a cup with a saucer, and two lumps of sugar always accompany it. The drink has several things to commend it, since it has none of the dangerous qualities of tea, coffee, or alcoholic drinks, and is declared by the doctors to be an excellent remedy for disorders of the stomach arising from certain forms of indigestion.

The greater part of the desert of Sahara is, it has been ascertained, from 6,000 to 2,000 feet above the level of the cosan. The desert is not rainless, but showers cover it with grass for a faw weeks every year, large flocks and herds being maintained upon its borders, and the cases are depressions in which water can be collected and stored. It was at one time believed that the whole of the desert was below the sea level, instead of only a comparatively small part of it.

A Chinese prison is called a "cangue." Its outer door is barred with bamboo and is guarded by petty soldiers or peticemen. The cangue contains two rooms and two yards. One room and one yard are for men. The other room and one yard are for women. The space set apart for women is very much smaller than that for men. But the women's quarters and the men's quarters are alike in being entirely devoid of any provision for personal comfort or decency.

First under water may be produced by placing some small pieces of phosphorus in a conical shaped glass tumbler, and then covering them with the crystals of chlorate of potash. Next fill the glass with water and then add a few drops of sulphuric acid—the acid to be applied directly to the phosphorous and potash crystals by means of a long tube. If the experiment is properly carried out tongues of bright red flame can be seen flashing up through the water, the intense chemical heat produced by the action of the sulphuric acid on the potash and phosphorus being sufficient to inflame the latter, although entirely covered with water.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Tinnig.-Letter goes in fourteen days. Joxy. - Sponge out with diluted beuzine.

CROSSY .- Ask at the Inland Revenue office A. C .- Pedlar's license, 5s., got from police.

READER. -- Any bookseller will obtain it for you.

ANNIOUS ANNIE,-The lawyer will tell you the cost.

QUILP .- At any shop where the instruments are sold.

WILLIE .- The stamp cannot be detached or used sgain. Controvensy. - Tay Bridge fell on Sunday, December 28th, 1879.

IGNORANT READER. -The "a" in patent is sounded us in fato.

M. T .- Wet it with soap-suds and lay it in the hot

Worsten-You must ask a lawyer to advise and to act for you. MARK.—Apply to a police magistrate for a maintenance

AUNTIE.-You can will it to whomsoever you may think fit.

SAM WELLER.-It is a matter of arrangement between buyer and seller.

ONE WHO WANTS TO KNOW .- Ascertain rule hitherto in force in the office where you are.

Two G .- Yes, if the mother becomes chargeable to the

F. M. S.—Forms for such agreements may be had t most stationers' shope.

GLARE. -Punctuation was first used in literature in the year 1520.

ONE IN TROUBLE .- An employer cannot be compelled to give a servant a character.

Par. -We are not able to guide you in a matter under Trials law.

Young Morran, ... Calld's birth can be registered only in district where it takes place.

B. E.-The Church of England does not receive any grant from the State.

Cunio. -- Either advertise or take it to some dealer. It is not worth much.

BRIDAL.-We cannot undertake to advise on questions of murriage objquette.

EDWARD.—Bernice comes from the Greek, meaning the one who brings victory.

C. B. W.-Write to Secretary, Civil Service Com-clusion, Cannon-row, Westminster, S.W. JONATHAM'S LOVE -Jonethan was a Jewish name

ming the gift of the Lord. ANXIOUS TO KNOW.—The voyage from Britain to India is made in thirteen days by the big steamers.

Ma BRILE.-Mabel, a favourite Latin and French name, means lovable.

improvenous.—Brother cannot by law be made to pay and penny, towards maintenance of sister.

Districes.—The marks in the face will gradually disprear without remedial treatment of any kind. Dick Warringron. -- There is a Lord Mayor of Loudon, York, Liverpool, and Manchester.

Senico. - Spring, 18th March; summer Sist June; utumu 28rd September; winter 21st December.

N. G.—No part of a wife's or daughter's earnings can be taken for a husband's or father's debts.

ROUGH HANDS.—Glycerine mixed with a little fre lemon juice will soften and whiten the skin.

MOSTAGUE. -- If there are no children, husband and wife's relatives each take half of all she possessed.

VERK.-A fish has no feeling in its fins. You can do nothing to assist the broken tail. CLAIRE.—The "At Home" cards should be sent out

NEIGHBOUR. -- You may be required to remove the Tatters.—If the dog is kept on your premises you must take out a license in your own name.

TROUBLED MOTREE. The father must be present to give consent to the redstration of infant in his name.

Indignant One. A clergyman may legally refuse to bury a non-parishioner in the parish graveyard.

INQUIRER. -- You require to make good any damage one to your neighbour in raising your walls.

LOVEL OF THE "LONDON READER."-State tre to your family doctor, and be guided by munendation. desire to

T. W.—Sponge with diluted benzine, taking the excess off on blotting paper, after which sponge with plain water, also removing excess moisture with blotting paper.

FELICIA.—Wash rice. Put it in plenty of boiling water with a little sale. Let it boil ten minutes, never stir, then drain and steam with the lid on quarter of an hour. Romember always to wash rice well.

Oscan.—Calamus root has been used instead of tobacco by those who wished to discontinue chewing, and with success.

ANXIOUS TO LEARN.—You would require personal instructions. It is an art not to be taught in a parif graph.

L. T.—You have no legal right to sell a ludger's goods or arrears of rent, but you may detain the goods as IBERE.—Eyebrows and eyelashes that are thin can, it is said, be improved considerably by rubbing every night with vaseline.

FAMILY MENDER.—Cotton thread is generally used to aw kid gloves, as it does not so readily out the kid as lik thread.

Hug.—Sneezing can be averted by pressing the upp lip against the teeth with the foreinger when the inclination will vanish.

BOOKWORM.—A bookseller in your own town will probably be able to supply you with catalogues containing the information desired.

BAD MANNERS.—There are only two rules for go manners. One is, always think of others; the other never think of yourself.

CITIZEM.—The theory of law is that every law-abiding man in the country is bound to give his services gratis to assist in bringing criminals to justice.

CAREFUL Man.—Applied to shoes, glycerine is a great preservative of the leather, and effectually keeps out the water and prevents wet feet.

HERE.-The word hairbreadth, difficitesimal space, was once a regular measure. was the width of sixteen hairs laid side by side.

Ju-Ju.—The tallest trees in the world grow in Australia. They are a species of marsh gum, and some are said to exceed three hundred foet in height.

LITTLE girl stood at the window A cerric girl stood at the window Of a house that was large and grand, And watched with a look of great longing And watched with a look of great chagn A little girl play in the sand. "I'd give my new doll just from Paris, With real curls and long silken skirt, My books, my mamma and my brother— If I sould just play in the dirt!"

The poor little girl that was playing Looked up at the house grand and due, "I wish that for only one hour That beautiful home could be raine ! I would dress in silk of the fluest, With my face clean and hair very neat, And look out and feel oh, so sorry, For the poor little girl in the street!"

Oh, green are the fields in the distance, And white are the clouds in the skry, And flowers that blor m high above us Are the flowers for which we e'er sigh. Oh, poor without doubt are the roth ones When wealth brings no comfort and rest, And rich without doubt are the poor ones, When their life as it is seemeth best.

PURCHASER—If a sale is arranged the purchaser is justified in refusing to pay more than the ticketed price; but if the shopkeeper desires more he may refuse

Millim.—A cream made up of magnesia and water lightly dabbed on over it, allowed to dry perfectly and then brushed up carefully with a clean soft-baired

Youngster.—The "French grey" paint you suggest would depend on the colouring and style of the room, and without a knowledge of that we are powerless to advise.

Lary Janz.—To clean gilding, remove all dust with a sett brush; then wash the gilding lightly and rapidly with warm water in which an onion has been boiled. Dry by rubbing with soft cloths.

SERKER AFTER KNOWLEDGE.—The greatest bell in the world—if we exclude one which lies broken at Moscow, and is estimated to weigh 443,772 pounds, and was nover hung—is that, also at Moscow, weighing 141,600 pounds.

C. A. T.—We know nothing better than warm water and seap to cleanse it. Brush in about the carving, and then dry well and rub up. A little pollsh at the last may be used, but good rubbing-up is the cleanest.

Wasn Tun.- In rinsing use water slightly warm ; the clothes will look better, you will not take a chill, and your hands will not be injured in appearance beyond the reach of glycerine and rese-water.

Is a PLIGHT.—Certainly the damage appears to be ery slight and ought not to necessitate the purchase of new mirror. Were it a total head, so that the glass was nitirely destroyed, it would, of course, be right for you o replace it: but as it is, you should merely be held for he damages.

A Victim —A successful method of curing a cold in the head consists in this ling through the nose the emanations of ammonis contained in a smelling-bottle. If the sense of smell be not soute, the bottle should be kept under the nose until the pungency of its contents has had the desired effect. W. W.—To remove dandruff, a solution of powdered borax and topid water is generally used. Wash the head thoroughly with it. If it leaves the hair too dry, apply a little vaseline, and rub it well into the roots of the hair.

SMOOTFFAGE.—If persistent shaving of your lips, chin, and cheeks does not produce moustache, whiskers, and beard, nothing will; in that case you come of a hairless family, and have inherited your smooth skin from your parents or their parents.

Orange Blossom.—If you wish to be married at church you must have the banns published three conse-cutive Sundays in the church of the parish in which you live. If you wish to be married at a district registrar's office you must give twenty one days' notice.

Scor.—Gaslic far older than books—that is to say, it existed as a spoken language for hundreds of years before it began to be written or printed; the oldest natural objects in the country—hills, mountains, and rivers—have all Gaelic names.

PERPLEXITY.—Glycerine is a sweetish liquid, without colour or smell, and is obtained from various fats and oils. When mixed with nitric and sulphuric acid glycerine becomes the explosive compound called nitroglycerine which is much stronger than gunpowder.

BLUE-EYED BESS. - To represent music have the wor and notes of songs printed on some lengths of cloth and make them up into a dress. Wear a guitar or mandolin with a ribbon, some castanets and a harmonica at the belt, and a jew's harp mounted as a pin in the hair.

X. Y. Z.—Planty of powdered borax scattered freely where they congregate, and forced into cracks and crevices where they are known to hide, if persevered in will finally rid you of them, but none of the remedies without perseverance will be so any avail.

Gran.—It should be thoroughly washed with het water and soap before using, and then boil some water in them for a short time, and pour it away; they will be then fit for use. A handful of hay boiled in a new pot is a good thing, and then boil water in it for half an hour.

UNEMPLOYUD.—Shorthand and typewriting are quite overdone, unless the operator is an expert, in which case there is an oxedient opportunity for good workers. Telegraphy is subject to very much the same criticism. Expert operators who are steady and reliable are rarely idle.

AN OLD SUBSCHEER.—The Glencoe massacre, which has made the valley historically famous, was the putting to death of the Macdonald tribe, in Scotland, for not surrandering before the time stated in King William's proclamation, December 31, 1891. A decree had been obtained to exhipste the tribe, which the King is said to have signed without reading it. The massacre began on February 13th, 1092. About sixty men were slain, and many women and oblidiers, their wives and offspring, were turned out of their homes, and did of cold and hunger. No punishment over followed the atrocity.

GERTH.—To make coffee-custard, take a large cup of fresh-ground coffee, break an egg into it; mix it up well; put it into a coffee-pot with a pint of boiling water. Boil it five minutes, add a cup of cold water, and let it stand ben minutes. Turn it off very class into a saccepan, add a pint of cream, and give it one boil. Have ready eight eggs well beaten, one and a half large cupfuls of sugar; turn the coffee and cream boiling hot on the eggs, stirring all the while. Put the custard into a pitcher, set it into boiling water, and shir it all the time until it thickens. Serve in cups to cat cold.

cai cold.

Balla.—A good receipt for boiling a turkey is the following: Shuff the turkey as for reasting. A very nice dreasing is made by chopping half a pint of cysters and matring these, with breadcounts, butter, pepper, and ealt, thy one or sweet marforam, and wet with nalls or water. Baste about the turkey a thin cloth, the inside of which has been dredged with flour, and put it to boil in cold water with a spoonful of salt in it. Let a large turkey simmer for two and a half or turce hours. Skim it while boiling. Serve with cyster sauce, made by adding to a cupful of the liquor in which the turkey was boiled the same quantity of milk and eight cysters chopped fine. Season with mined paraley; stir in a spoonful of rice or wheat flour wet with cold milk, and add a teaspoonful of batter. Bell up once and pour into a turcen. up once and pour into a tureen.

THE LOSDOW READER, Post-free. Three-halfpence Weekly; or Quarterly, One Shilling and Eightpence.

ALL BACK NUMBERS, PARTS and VOLUMES are in print and may be had of all Booksellers.

NOTICE.—Part 392, Now Ready, price Sixpence, post-ce, Eightpence. Also Vol. LXII., bound in cloth, is 64

THE INDEX TO VOL. LXII, is Now Ready; Price One Penny, post-free, Three-halfpence.

THE LONDON READER, 334, Strand, W.C.

fu

ha

all

3 7

301

1;† We cannot undertake to return rejected manuscripts.

London: Published for the Proprietor, at 834, Strand, y G. F. Conspond; and printed by Woodfall and by G. F. CORNFOLD; and printed by KINDER, 70 to 76, Long Acre. W.C.